WINFIELD I. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
J. H. MILLER, Managing Editor.

With this number we begin Volume III of THEMIS. We think faith has been kept with our patrons regarding the character of our labors. Our historical matter has been complimented and largely copied and quoted by the press here and elsewhere. Nothing has been published that was not based on substantial facts. The literary work has been of a superior order and has also drawn the attention of the press to its excellence. It is without egotism we can say, that as an exponent of local affairs, and general politics, much good has been accomplished. The editorial writers are in a position to become familiar with passing events, and have a thorough knowledge of the history of the State, as well as of general literature. We are independent in thought, and knowing whereof we speak and write, can do so with independence. Since our last volume the managing editor has been changed, A. J. Johnston having been honored with a prominent State office, necessitating his retirement. John H. Miller, an experienced newspaper man, has assumed the management. This has not, however, changed the editorial character of the paper. With this volume we contemplate some additions, which will require an enlargement of the paper. As soon as arrangements can be made this change will occur. By this we will be enabled to give our readers a greater amount of reading matter. We shall continue to devote our abilities to making authentic history, and presenting the first order of literature. Local advancement is one of our objects. Clean politics will always find a champion in THEMIS. We ask the support of those who want a clean and reliable paper. THEMIS is loyal Republican in politics; we have no schemes to promote nor "isms" to advocate. We have no enemies to punish, no friends to reward. We aim to speak kindly and freely upon every important public question. We shall never fail to express our opinion through fear or favor. The past numbers are evidence of this fact.

The Republican City Convention was held Tuesday evening. It was a body of 160, chosen from ten subdivisions in the city. There has been no criticism adverse concerning its determinations, and so far it has not been made apparent that there will be any serious opposition to any gentleman nominated by that body. As we have said in former issues of this paper, it would be idle and an insult to the judgment of men who view human nature as it is to expect that any convention, however selected, and of whomsoever, would be satisfactory to the element that exists in all communities, who seek for faults only, and whose spectacles will magnify the imaginary into the real. Therefore, it is that we must view the determinations that have been made by the Republican Convention with regard more to the intentions of the citizens who sat in the body, and upon whom responsibility was cast. The city is in a critical financial position, and we believe that, regardless of partisanship, the situation is fully realized by property-holders and those concerned in our material progress. The platform adopted by the Convention is brief, but has a wealth of meaning. It outlines a policy for local government that of necessity must be pursued. The nominees of the Convention will undoubtedly carry out its spirit to the very letter. With a feeling that it was necessary to add strength to our municipal legislature, the Republican Convention nominated Alonzo Conklin for a member of the Board of Trustees. Mr. Conklin is a man of independence; his interests are with the people of this community; he is the unanimous choice of the chosen representatives of the majority of our people. It has been that we have been compelled to voice the universal sentiment of the people that there is need for more backbone, dignity and intelligence concerning municipal affairs in our local legislature. The opportunity comes fortunately that a change can be made by the people every year so far as one member of the Board is concerned. We believe the determination of the people should be in favor of Mr. Conklin. He has had experience in the management of municipal government in the East and here; his nomination comes without solicitation—a case of the office seeking the man. In view of what THEMIS and the other journals have published within the last few weeks concerning the attitude of the owners of the antique municipal bonds towards the present population, we feel justified in saying that the situation of this city is critical, and that if our people will not pay more attention to their own business we can expect that capital will give us the cold shoulder, and the only hope we will have of distinction will be perhaps a century hence, when Sacramento will occupy a position not even so creditable as that of Pompeii and Herculaneum. Those cities were not destroyed through any matter of local legislation, but simply because they were located too near to the volcano of Vesuvius. It is perhaps an unjust comparison to draw, in that the volcano gave no warning, while in the case of Sacramento the warning has been constant. With us it has been that progressive business firms have shut their doors and removed to San Francisco; that upon the sign-boards of very many of the business houses of the metropolis at the sea the names of former Sacramento firms are inscribed. If there has been a manufacturing business of importance successfully conducted since the days that very many of those who now are expected to control the destinies of the city were born, it would be of interest to many of our present inhabitants and property-holders to know its location. We do not complain, nor could we conscientiously, that our present Board of Trustees is anything but weak, but we feel that mental strength should be added. In Mr. Conklin we have full confidence. Should he be selected, the people will have a Trustee.

Captain J. D. Young has been nominated for City Auditor. He was for very many years an editor of the Sacramento Union and of the Sacramento Record-Union, and had particular charge of the city department. He is a native of Ogdensburg, N. Y., and from his earliest life was thrown into circumstances that he was compelled to care for himself. Without the advantages that most have, having been left an orphan at an early age, he commenced his career as a cabin boy on the lake steamers of New York. He learned the printing trade in the office of the Buffalo Republic, and in 1861 came to California and became a compositor in the office of the Sacramento Union. While at the printer's case Captain Young was esteemed as among the best compositors on the coast, and when the Legislature, during the flood of 1861-62, removed from this city to San Francisco, the Union sent with it its shorthand reporters and its expert compositors. Their duty was to report the proceedings of the Senate and Assembly and put it in type. The type was sent here and printed. Captain Young was largely trusted with that important work—an enterprise in journalism that the exactions at that time demanded and which was successful. From the printer's case he was promoted to the editorship of the city department of the paper, and retained that position until January 10, 1880, when Governor Perkins appointed him Superintendent of State Printing. He was reappointed to that position by Governor Waterman. We are not aware that there is any other person more fitted from experience to perform the duties of the office of City Auditor than is Captain Young.

John J. Buckley, the nominee for City Assessor, has filled the office satisfactorily. He was born in Boston, and came with his parents to Sacramento in 1859. He was educated in this city in our public schools, and for five years was a locomotive fireman for the Central Pacific Railroad Company. In 1880 he engaged in the business of searcher of records. For several years he has been the Assessor of the city properties, and it cannot be stated that he has not been an efficient officer.

George A. Putnam, the nominee for City Collector, is too well known that it should be necessary particular reference should be made to him. He arrived in California from around the Horn in July, 1849, and has been in business in Sacramento since 1853. When the war broke out he went into the army, and in 1863 was commissioned a Major in the United States service. His administration of the office of City Collector has been completely satisfactory.

For Fire Commissioners there have been named John Weil for the long term and William B. Miller for the short term. Mr. Weil is at present a member of the board and served a term as State Treasurer. Mr. Miller has been in business among us for years and has never been an aspirant for an office.

We sincerely hope that in view of the blunders of the past, follies will not be repeated, and we urge from the standpoint of citizens and taxpayers that the interests of this city shall be protected. We are dissatisfied; we believe the people are—and they are supreme—with the management as it now exists. This criticism we particularly direct to the Board of Trustees. We are conscious that Mr. Conklin has no owner save the people themselves; to them he will act with justice, and did we not feel that he would exercise a proper spirit of independence we would not ask his election. Matters political have occurred within the last few years that we esteem have resulted in disadvantage to the citizens of Sacramento. Let us not repeat the blunders of the past. Why, after a fair expression by such a convention as met here on Tuesday night, can any reasonable man fail to indorse its action and vote for its nominees?

Sherman is dead. There was in Rome the Triumvirate—the three who governed. In our country we had a military triumvirate—Grant, Sheridan and Sherman. We mention them in the order of their deaths. With the fall of each there has been an expression of regret, not alone from our own country, but from the civilized world. Of the American military triumvirate, Gen. Grant was the recognized head. He died after a painful illness at Mt. McGregor, New York, on July 23, 1885. He was born April 27, 1822. Sheridan was born March 6, 1831, and died at a comparatively early age. Sherman, the last to fall, was born Feb. 8, 1820. Strangely, all three of these men figured in California in our early days. At the outbreak of the war they came from private life and tendered their services to the government. Others, perhaps, would have occupied their places had circumstances been favorable, and it would be unjust, particularly to Gen. McClellan, to say of him he could have done better than he did at the time when he had the general command and suffered defeat. Regarding only the one who has just passed away—Sherman—it is of more interest to recall his history before the outbreak of the civil war than his brilliant campaigns and the distinction he justly received afterward—a distinction that will endure. Leaving California he went to St. Louis and had the insignificant rank of captain, though he had served from his graduation from West Point on June 30, 1840, almost continuously in active military service. In 1860 he was appointed to the position of President of the State Military Academy of Louisiana, and remained in that position until before the outbreak of the civil war. We will here quote from the New York Herald of Dec. 12, 1864:

He had carefully watched the development of the portentous events of the winter of 1860 and 1861, and even before the first shot on Sumter sounded the summons to arms, felt confident of the impossibility of avoiding an open rupture between the two sections of the country. True to the old flag, he addressed a letter of resignation to the authorities of the institution. The letter is so characteristic of the man that we embody it in full:

JANUARY 18, 1861.

Governor Thomas O. Moore, Baton Rouge, La.: SIR—As I occupy a quasi military position under this State, I deem it proper to acquaint you that I accepted such position when Louisiana was a State in the Union, and when the motto of the seminary was inserted in marble over the main door: "By the liberality of the General Government of the United States—the Union. Esto Perpetua." Recent events foreshadow a great change, and it becomes all men to choose. If Louisiana withdraws from the Federal Union, I prefer to maintain my allegiance to the old constitution as long as a fragment of it survives, and my longer stay here would be wrong in every sense of the word. In that event I beg you will send or appoint some authorized agent to take charge of the arms and munitions of war here, belonging to the State, or direct me what disposition should be made of them. And furthermore, as President of the Board of Supervisors, I beg you to take immediate steps to relieve me as Superintendent the moment the State determines to secede: for on no earthly account will I do any act or think any thought hostile to or in defiance of the old government of the United States. With great respect, etc., W. T. SHERMAN.

His resignation was accepted, and he removed to St. Louis. During that season of dreadful suspense intervening the inauguration of the new President and the bombardment of Fort Sumter, Captain Sherman was in Washington. He conversed freely with persons of all positions and views, and was surprised to see the indifference exhibited on the great question of the day. A personal friend thus narrates the captain's views at the time: He was astonished at the apparent ignorance and incredulity of the government in regard to the real condition of the Southern States. He declared that the men in authority were sleeping on a volcano, which would surely burst upon them unprepared. Filled with this idea, he addressed a letter to the Secretary of War, stating that as he was educated at the expense of the United States, and owed everything to his country, he had come to tender his military services. He warned Mr. Cameron in earnest language that war was imminent, and that we were not prepared. He also called upon the President, and in like manner stated his views and tendered his services. The President jocularly replied: "We shall not need many men like you; the whole affair will soon blow over." He was then urged by his friends to go to Ohio, and take care of the organization of three months' regiments. This he declined as he did not believe in such trifling expedients. He declared it would be as wise to undertake to extinguish the flames of a burning building with a squirt gun as to put down the rebellion with three months' troops. His plan was to organize for a gigantic war, to call out the whole military power of the country at once, and, by the exercise of irresistible force, to crush the rebellion in its incipency.

This letter of Gen. Sherman's was at that time regarded as the act of an insane man, yet later it developed he was right. It did occur that President Lincoln changed the head of his War Department, and that he was made to believe, as was the fact, that he could better trust the Generals in the field than the Secretary in his Cabinet. The result was that President Lincoln on January 15, 1862, appointed Edwin M. Stanton Secretary of War; an appointment that could be regarded as anomalous, in that Stanton had been the Attorney-General in the administration of President Buchanan, and had served in a Cabinet with men who were inimicable to the federal government. It, however, happened that Stanton was the proper man for the place. Lincoln at the time we speak of did not realize that which Sherman foresaw. He did later on. When Sherman advocated the proposition that there should be preparation made for a gigantic war, it was ridiculed and regarded as the vagaries of a crazy man. The estimate that was passed upon him as a military commander cannot be better stated than in the language of Gen. Grant concerning the surrender of Gen. Johnston. It was at the closing of the war, and Grant wrote in his memoirs, after stating that he had gone to Raleigh: "When I arrived I went to Sherman's headquarters, and we were at once closeted together." Grant then stated to Sherman that the terms of the surrender of Gen. Johnston had not been authorized at Washington, but to show the confidence that Grant had in Sherman, after he had informed Sherman that the terms which Sherman had made with Johnston would not be regarded as the same that Grant had given Lee, Grant placed the whole matter into the hands of Sherman. Throughout the writings of Gen. Grant there is an exhibition of high regard for Sherman and Sheridan. And in the writings of Gen. Sherman there is that regard paid, not only to the federal commanders, but of deserving Generals of the South. Among his pall-bearers was Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, of the confederate army, who was among the last to surrender his command, and that surrender was made to Sherman. The matter of the terms of the surrender of Gen. Johnston and his force of 50,000 men was made the subject of an inquiry before a committee of Congress, and the testimony there given by Gen. Sherman is of historic interest.

The government troops are to be congratulated by the entire country for the speedy manner in which they have settled the late Indian difficulty. It is true that many good men fell victims to the redskins, but considering the uprising, the number of Indians that were on the war path, Uncle Sam's soldiers are to be complimented. The history of the aboriginal races of the American continent is an interesting study, not only to the people of the United States, but also to those of other lands, who regard them as the congeners of the nomadic hords, which in times long past swarmed over the plains of now civilized Europe. In many respects there is a very close resemblance between the characters and final fate of all the primitive tribes and nations of the world—their mode of government, habits, customs, etc., being somewhat similar—as well as their final absorption or disappearance, following an inexorable natural law, which decrees the submission of the animal to intellectual development. From the study of past events alone can an opinion be formed of the causes that give origin to them, and for this reason should every American citizen who desires to understand the true history of his country peruse with attention the records of the former owners of that soil which ere long will no more give sustenance to any of their descendants. No ordinary task is it for the faithful chronicler to trace the history of a people who have no written annals and no written language; whose only records are of a pictographic character; and whose traditions are so vague and unconnected as to be very unreliable. Such are the difficulties he has to encounter anterior to the discovery of America by Columbus; and even subsequent to that period, owing to the unsettled condition of the country until within the last half century, years of research and comparison are rendered necessary in order to reconcile conflicting statements and unravel the tangled web of confused narrative. The last remnant of the race will soon in spirit, if not in words, echo the language of a poetic writer, who thus portrays the sole survivor as apostrophizing the Diety:

"Where is my home—my forest home? the proud land of my sires?
Where stands the wigwam of my pride? where gleam the council fires?
Where are my father's hallowed graves? my friends so light and free?
Gone, gone, forever from my view! Great Spirit? can it be?"

Marian Harland has written many things in favor of her sex. She is a womanly woman. She says the prevailing notion of society puts girls at a certain age in a pitiful frame of mind, which is shared by their mothers. It is less so now than formerly, and girls now spend in educating themselves for self support some of the years which were formerly spent in angling for husbands and worrying for fear they should not get a bite. But many ill-starred marriages are contracted now, in the face of great risks in the character of the man, which would be saved if the young woman was assured of independent position and was free to accept or reject.

"In God We Trust."

The motto "In God We Trust," which is now stamped on all gold and silver coins of United States money, was suggested by an honest, God-fearing old farmer of the State of Maryland. He thought that our national coinage should indicate the Christian character of this nation, and by introducing a motto upon its coins express a national reliance on divine support in governmental affairs. In 1861, when Salmon P. Chase was Secretary of the Treasury, he wrote him and suggested that, as we claimed to be a Christian people, we should make suitable recognition of that fact on our coinage. The letter was referred to the Director of the Mint, James Pollack of Pennsylvania. In Mr. Pollack's report for 1862 he discussed the question of a recognition of the sovereignty of God and our trust in Him on our coins. The proposition to introduce a motto upon our coins was favorably considered by Mr. Chase, and in the report he said he did not doubt, but believed that it would meet with an approval by an intelligent public sentiment. But Congress gave no attention to the suggestion, and in his next annual report he again referred to the subject, this time in a firm, theological argument, and said: "The motto suggested, 'God Our Trust,' is taken from our national hymn, 'The Star Spangled Banner.' The sentiment is familiar to every citizen of our country; it has thrilled millions of American freemen. The time is propitious; 'tis an hour when man's strength is weakness, when our strength and salvation must be of God. Let us reverently acknowledge His sovereignty, and let our coinage declare our trust in God." A two-cent bronze piece was authorized to be coined by Congress the following year, April 22, 1864, and upon this was first stamped the motto "In God We Trust." In his report for that year he expressed his approval of the act, and strongly urged that the recognition of trust be extended to the gold and silver coins of the United States. By the fifth section of the Act of Congress of March 3, 1865, the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, was authorized to place upon all the gold and silver coin of the United States susceptible of such additions thereafter to be issued the motto "In God We Trust."

Marshall the Discoverer of Gold.

First, as to the men at Coloma in January, 1848, Marshall was not enriched. His lumber was soon in demand at $500 a thousand feet of board measure, or twenty-fold more than he had expected when he commenced his work; but not many months elapsed before all the good timber trees near Coloma had been cut down by the miners, and then the mill had to stop. He turned his attention to mining, but was not successful. When he had money he did not know how to keep it. When he had a good claim he did not stick to it. When friends tried to help him he frequently refused their offers with a snarl. He imagined offenses where none were intended. He complained of plots against his life in a community where nearly everybody acknowledged obligation to him. He was irritated by the superior popularity and prosperity of Sutter, by the fact that to Sutter the main credit of the gold discovery was given by many newspapers and influential citizens, and that partly under the influence of that idea, a pension of $250 a month was given to Sutter in 1870, while the true discoverer received nothing. After the publication of Marshall's biography in 1870, the Legislature perceived the injustice of its exclusive favor to Sutter, and in the course of six years it gave $9,600 as a pension to Marshall, but left him to spend the last eight years of his life in poverty and privation. In 1885, at the age of seventy-three, he died while alone in a solitary cabin which he occupied in company with another aged and indigent pioneer miner. He was buried at Coloma in sight of the place where he discovered the gold. His figure, in colossal bronze, stands over his grave.—John S. Hittell in February Century.

One Sunday, during high mass at 12, in the chapel of the little village of Glengariff, three ladies of the Protestant faith were obliged to take shelter from one of those heavy summer showers which so frequently occurs in the south of Ireland. The officiating priest, knowing who they were, and wishing to appear respectful to them, stooped down to his attendant, or clerk, who was on his knees, and whispered to him: "Three chairs for the Protestant ladies." The clerk, being an ignorant man, mistook the words, stood up and shouted to the congregation, "Three cheers for the Protestant ladies!" which the congregation immediately took up, and gave three hearty cheers, while the clergyman actually stood dumbfounded.

"My dear doctor, if all your patients are getting along as well as you seem to be, then you cannot be getting along at all."

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

The suspicion is growing in certain quarters that departed social eminence does not necessarily imply innate artistic talent nor high qualifications for the stage.

Sardou is a strange man, of wonderful talent and versatility. He has only achieved his present high place in the literary and dramatic world by the hardest struggling against adverse circumstances.

Emma Juch has a truly prima-donna-like appetite, if a story told of her in Cincinnati is true. It is averred that after a performance of William Tell in that city she devoured three weiner wursts and three beef sandwiches, drank three glasses of beer and—looked for more.

Great Actress (to hotel clerk)—I left my diamond necklace on the bureau in my room, and now it's gone. Send word to the police immediately, and—the newspapers. Hotel Clerk—One of the servants saw your necklace there and brought it to me. It is in the safe. Great Actress (hotly)—I—I wish people would attend to their own business. So, there!

It is pleasant to know that Mme. Adelina Patti has at last been cinched. For a quarter of a century she has been stalking over the earth, robbing creation with an effrontery that would have paralyzed the gang that persecuted Ali Baba. Now, at last, a manager whom she sought to mulct has mulcted her, and we think that that manager is entitled to the graceful plaudits of all Christendom.

"I don't understand your audacity, young man, in desiring to marry my daughter." So spoke the stern father. "From what I can hear you seem to have nothing but a little reputation as an amateur actor. I don't believe you could support your wife." The youth looked a good deal surprised and after a pause stammered: "Why, your daughter doesn't want to star, does she?"

Joseph Hatton's new play, John Needham's Double, is founded on the author's novel. It was arranged, on Mr. Hatton's suggestion, that it should be first produced in America. The story opens in England and closes in America. There is a first act in an English midland county and a bustling act in London, and the denouement is in a picturesque Kentucky home. Mr. Willard will play two parts, one a generous, easy-going country gentleman, the other an ambitious financier and politician.

Our country was first visited by a ballet in 1827, and all women in the audience of the Old Bowery Theatre rose in outraged modesty and dignity, and left this then most fashionable place of divertissement. Such men as were not in fear of wifely reproaches, or perhaps we should say those men who were sufficiently courageous to face frowning wives and sweethearts, remained to look with delight upon guazy leg-rhythms for all their billets of admission allowed. That was sixty-four years ago. To-day Miss Leontine Morgan, of Boston—think of that, of Boston—is to be a premiere danseuse at the Metropolitan Opera House. She has devoted every day of the last four years to her pretty, dexterous toes, and with a proper confidence that a Boston atmosphere was sufficient for her brain development, she has had no need for other training.

The story of Dresden China, a new ballet now running in New York, is historical, and based on events that occurred in the reign of King August, the Strong, of Saxony. Boetcher, the alchemist, was imprisoned by King August, and was to remain in confinement until he had discovered the secret of making gold. He was allowed all the luxuries of life, and had his valet to attend to his every want. One night Boetcher, sitting in his armchair, ponders on the one subject that occupies his mind. He falls asleep. While he slumbers two visions appear—one, the God of Gold, and another, the Goddess of Glory. The visions disappear, and morning breaks. The factotum comes in with peruke in hand and tries to wake his master up. Boetcher is half asleep, so the man places the bowl, filled with earth (which was then used to powder the hair); in Boetcher's hand, while he proceeds with his toilet. The alchemist awakes, and, angered at finding the bowl in his hand, throws it in the fire, where, accidentally, it strikes his retort, which breaks, and the earth and liquid run together. Boetcher, watching this, notices that the earth burns hard and white; so, in great astonishment, he jumps up and pours the melted earth into a mold and leaves it to take form. At length he opens the mold and discovers a plain white porcelain figure, with no flaw or spots, and thus the discovery of porcelain was made. While he is exulting over his invention, an officer enters with two soldiers and inquires whether the secret of gold-making has been discovered. Boetcher says "No," but he has discovered something else which is fully as precious. The officer tells him that his orders are to put him in chains and take him away. They drag him off and cast him in a dungeon, and the Court Marshal arrives to see that the orders are carried out. The factotum shows the Marshal the porcelain figure, and explains how it was made. The Marshal comprehends the value of the new invention and hastens to the King, who, with his retinue of courtiers, is on a hunting expedition. The scene changes to the King's hunting palace, where dancing and feasting are in progress. The Marshal enters and informs the King that gold has not been discovered, but china has been invented. The King evinces but little interest, so the Marshal asks him to see some proof of the new invention. The King consents, and a procession and ballet of the images and vessels appear. The delighted King releases Boetcher and covers him with honors, and the curtain descends on a tableau, after a grand ballet by the china images.

Book Chat.

The sale of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" averages about 30,000 copies per year. This is pretty well for a book entering on its fortieth year.

A man 60 years old has become crazy from reading sensational stories. This is another illustration of the saying that "reading maketh a fool man."

Think of the library of the British Museum—forty miles of solid thought! and of the National Library in Paris—150,000 acres of printed pages! What fields are these for intellectual browsing and cud chewing of reflection.

The Academy of Sciences of Cracow has just published a poem of the sixteenth century which treats on the same subject as "King Lear." The unique copy of the work still extant has been hidden away in a public library, and has but lately been discovered.

Ernest Renan once had occasion to telegraph across the British channel the subject of a proposed lecture. The subject as stated by him was "The Influence of Rome on the Formation of Christianity." It was published in England as "The Influence of Rum on the Digestion of Humanity."

If you want to brighten and polish your girls, if you want them to have ideas and ideals, if you want them to be entertained and instructed, give them good books. It won't hurt them to read a little of love, romance and real life. It is this condiment that will make the useful information palatable.

When the primeval journalist who edited the first cenozoic newspapers in the stone age got hold of an item reporting a calamitous blizzard he was wont to hew out a big display head with the words "Death Rides on the Storm." And the modern American newspaper man, following his example, puts death a-horseback of every cyclone, hurricane and thunder shower. It is about time that this Byronic simile between death and a jockey be given a rest. It is over-worked.

We have cant in business, cant in society, in politics, in religion, in every place where men and women are to be found, repeating what others have said before them, without realizing its meaning or attempting to follow it to its legitimate conclusion. Even editors cant. Everybody who talks is liable to cant—doctors, lawyers, politicians, preachers, scientists, teachers, hod carriers—the whole business of us cant with every word that is not the result of a deliberate and more or less painful effort to tell nothing but the truth.

Unlike many authors, Bret Harte never does an ambitious piece of literary work amid the din of the city. Whenever the plot of a story gets thoroughly crystallized in his mind he repairs to a quiet suburban retreat just outside of London, and there he works. And in this little nook the author is at present hard at work upon a new story of considerable length. Only a few of his closest friends know the whereabouts of his cave of seclusion, and even these he has never asked to join him there. The novelist works steadily when he is in seclusion, and stops only for an hour's walk every day. When at work his diet is a very frugal one; he retires early and is up just after dawn, working often several hours before he has his morning coffee, eggs and rolls. For two months he will thus keep himself secluded; then, returning to London, he places his manuscript in the hands of the publisher and considers his work done, for Bret Harte hates proof reading.

Professional Chat.

If Mr. Pepper is wise he will make his next brilliant success as an orator by carefully not making any speeches. This seems to be the one way in which he can favorably stand comparison with Ingalls.

"Take any twenty-five tall, lean men," said an old court officer to a reporter, "and you can secure a jury in a murder case. They have no conscientious scruples against the death penalty. As a rule, short, thick men have doubts on this point."

Even the Courts do not overlook the minor court-esses of life. It has long been considered improper to compel a female witness to tell her age unless it is necessary to the better understanding of the case, and lawyers usually withdraw the question if the witness hesitates to disclose the interesting secret. A New Jersey court has now decided that a referee cannot compel a lady, who is not a party to the suit, to raise her veil, so that she may be identified by a witness.

The new Idaho Senator, Shoup, is getting himself talked about because of his wild and woolly expressions. He approached Morton during the night session last week in one of the cloak-rooms, and slapping the Vice-President on the back, said: "Mr. Vice-President, shake; your ruling awhile ago was dead game." Later he addressed Hoar as follows: "Old man, that was a dandy speech you made for the bill, and we will stand by you until hell freezes over."

It is a most remarkable fact that women doctors have less delicacy with their patients than men. Young girls are absolutely shocked, and it is from them that the lady physicians receive their severest criticism. Let a young lady receive treatment for the same or different illness from each sex, and her preference will be the man doctor every time. Ask her why, and the invariable answer will be that Dr. Mary Matter of Fact is not nice. And not only that, but as a class they are less sympathetic, less considerate, less cheery than medical men.

The late Charles Bradlaugh owed much of his success as an orator to his fine stage presence. He was six feet two inches in height and magnificently proportioned. His gestures were most dramatic. In his lecture on Oliver Cromwell, in the passage where he describes Cromwell as drawing his sword and throwing away the scabbard, he was accustomed to put so much spirit into the action that the audience could almost see the flashing of the imaginary blade. Once an old army officer cried out, "My God! That man has been in the cavalry." And so he had been.

The majority of lawyers prefer not to take divorce cases; not so much as a matter of principle as of prudence. Women are, with occasional exceptions, unreasonable clients. The fact that the lawyer is simply a business man attending to their business seems never to present itself to their female mind. The women think the lawyer must of necessity enter into her likes and dislikes, her piques and jealousies, in fact take up as a labor of love that which is supposed to be a plain transaction for money. If he mildly suggests a retainer, she is shocked by such evidence of mercenary spirit, and begins to lose confidence in him.

"The late Sunset Cox," said Judge Abbott, of Texas, to a reporter, "was a man whose love of humor did not find exclusive vent through his facile pen. His merry nature delighted in getting the laugh on some one of his friends, and I shall never forget a little prank he played on my colleague, Judge Hare. Hare and Cox had struck up a friendly acquaintance, following closely upon the former's entree into the Fortieth Congress. One day they chanced to meet about noon in one of the Capitol corridors, and Hare invited the New-Yorker to go down stairs and lunch with him. 'Much obliged,' said Cox, 'but won't you wait on me five or ten minutes; I must see a man on the floor on important business; then I'll join you.' 'All right,' said Hare, 'I'll await you down stairs, and if you see a friend you would like to have bring him along, too.' Into Cox's fun-loving cranium a scheme straightway crept. He had dispatched what business he had in a twinkling, and then proceeded to confer with first one Congressman and then another till at last nine of us followed him out of the Chamber and down into the House restaurant, where Judge Hare was sitting at a table alone. A rather surprised look came over the face of the Texas Representative when he saw the company Cox had brought. But it vanished in a moment, and he bade us all welcome in the heartiest manner. 'Now, gentlemen, by the way of an appetizer, what will you take?' Cox, who was next to him, spoke up without a moment's hesitation: 'I'll have a bottle of champagne.' 'Bring me a bottle of champagne also,' said Moore. 'Ditto,' ordered Crane, and thus it went around, each man ordering a 'small bottle' until the waiter got back to the eleventh and last man, the host of the day, who, bringing his fist down on the table with some emphasis, said: 'Why, I'll take a bottle of champagne, too.' Nobody smiled, but when the fluids were disposed of it was a study to note the changes of our entertainer's face as each man began ordering the most expensive dishes on the bill. But things went on swimmingly, and hilarity rose to a great height—among ten of us, at least. Finally, the feast ended, and Hare, beckoning the waiter to him, said: 'I don't know whether I've got enough money with me to pay this account, but bring on your ticket and I'll see.' He looked more puzzled than at any time when the waiter came back saying that there was nothing to pay. Then it dawned on him that Sunset Cox had been playing a little joke, and amid roars of laughter from the crowd he protested that Cox should not pay a farthing. But it had all been pre-arranged and the statesman-humorist got more than the $50 that the luncheon cost him out of the fun of watching the bewildered looks of the Judge."

NOTES.

Ninety thousand cows, it is calculated, have to be milked twice a day to supply London alone.

Senatorial elections by popular vote would be a decided improvement over the monotonous contests prevailing in various States.

There are some who wish to make a law that will close the place where the poor man gets his beer, but to allow the rich club to remain open.

"I am quite well pleased with my son in law," said old Mrs. Pickaslaw. "My influence over him is great. Ever since I have been at his house he has stayed down town at work until 10 and 11 o'clock at night."

"Cheap money means cheap labor, and cheap labor means trouble," says an Eastern paper. This is one of the cries of the gold bugs against the silver coinage measures now before Congress. Cheap rates of interest show an abundance of money. When money is plentiful we all secure our due proportion. It is when money is close and tight that hard times comes knocking at the door. The expression, however, is not true, because "cheap money" does not mean cheap labor. Cheap labor does mean trouble, when it results in not allowing sufficient to keep the wolf from the door.

A motherly old soul named Mrs. Gray is described in a recent number of the Arena as thus expressing herself regarding lovelorn damsels: "Girls in love ain't no use in the whole blessed week. Sundays, in the mornin', they're lookin' down the road, expectin' he'll come. Sunday afternoons they can't think o' nothin' else, cause he's here. Monday they're sleepy an' kind o' dreamy and slimsy, 'cause he's gone. Tuesday and Wednesday and Thursday they git absent-minded and begin to look off towards Sunday agin' an' mope aroun' an' let the dish-water git cold right under their noses. Friday they break dishes an' go off in the best room an' snivel, and look out o' the window. Saturday they have queer spurts of workin' like all p'sessed an' spurts o' frizin' their hair. An' Sunday they begin' it all over agin'."

The London Graphic prophesies that the fashion of wedding rings for the husband will rapidly become popular. It is an innocent fashion enough and might sometimes prevent awkward mistakes. Dutiful husbands, unaccompanied by their wives, would not inadvertently have the air of being gay bachelors, thus leading the other sex to lose valuable time. Of course, when a man wishes to pass himself off as unmarried—designing persons are sometimes guilty of this impropriety—a mere finger ring would be no obstacle. It would have to be a nose ring, and this fashion is unlikely ever to become the vogue. However, if married men wish to wear wedding rings there is nothing to prevent them. Some husbands seem to like their domestic status to be known as widely as possible; people have even been known to talk about their children to strangers.

Siberia has no less a bad name for lawlessness than for climate, for convicts escape from confinement during summer and prowl about preying upon the inhabitants. This is often done with the connivance of the police authorities, it is said, who not merely draw the allowance for the escaped convict, but accept part of the spoil when he returns with the approach of winter, when no robber can live in the woods or on the road through the long months of severe frost. An attempt is about to be made to reform the administration, chiefly with the view of separating the office of Judge d'Instruction, or examining judge, from police functions. In each town and village of Western Siberia there is to be, according to the proposal coming before the Imperial Council, a creation of justices of the peace. The present provincial tribunals will fulfill the functions of a Court of Appeal.

From the figures derived from the late census we learn that steam vessels which have been built during the last four years are of a constantly increasing size. In 1886 there were but 21 propellers of over 1,500 tons burden; in 1890 there were 110 propellers of this class. But the tonnage of vessels of this class has increased more rapidly than their number. Thus the total tonnage of the 21 vessels of over 1,500 tons burden in 1886 was 34,868, while the total tonnage of the 110 vessels in 1890 was 188,399; that is to say, the percentage of increase in the number of vessels is 423.81, while the percentage of increase in tonnage is 440.29. The total value of this class of vessels in 1886 was $2,645,000; in 1890 it was $15,000,092, showing an increase for the four years of 570.59 per cent. A comparison similar to this for any of the classes of vessels, when taken in connection with well-known facts relative to the ownership of these large vessels, clearly shows that the traffic of the Great Lakes is rapidly coming under the control of companies having at their command large capital.

Friendship.

There is no one blessing that we should esteem more highly, and none which renders life more joyous, than friendship. We are deprived of the pleasure it affords, our lives, instead of being to us as the sunny day, would be periods of gloom and darkness. By regarding man as he was when society first existed, and then studying him as he now is, how great a contrast do we behold. Before the first breach of friendship—between God and man—all was tranquility, happiness and enjoyment, but so soon as that state of mind was found in man which led him to defy his Maker, the floodgates of enmity were raised; and man, feeling it towards God, transferred it to his fellow creatures. We are not to infer that there is no such thing as friendship, still it must be admitted that, generally speaking, it exists in a mutilated form. The remains of it should cause us to prize it the more highly, and it may not be thought wrong to bestow a few thoughts upon it. This sentiment is found in others beside those who have reached mature years. For, by reviewing our childhood, we shall find that in that period of life it begins to develop itself. We then form many friendships, without much discrimination, indeed, but most true and enduring; and though many of the impressions the heart receives are worn out in its progress to maturity, yet those which remain become the most efficient principles of action. Friendship is an emotion as common as fear, sympathy or any other, and it must come in the early years of life or it comes too late for a full development of its power. The links between mankind do not appear with the same rapidity, shining up and then disappearing like the sudden lightning in the clouds, but slowly and gradually taking their position they remain, like the sun, bright and permanent. Had it not been for this union of mind to mind how different would have been the condition of society; and what is there that conduces more to its happiness than this our second element—the society of friends? Bereft of this, the affections would grow colder and colder, until at last we should possess the same selfish feelings which characterize the brutes, and should be robbed of those noble principles which elevate us above all other created beings. If we know persons to be selfish we cannot be sure of their honesty; and certainly it is not to be considered a matter of little weight to choose companions to whom we cannot reveal ourselves. Still, those hours are not lost which are spent in cementing friendships, as is very evident in affliction and sorrow. For from whom can we receive more sympathy than from a tried friend. How desolate must be the lot of such as are without friends! As a ship in the midst of the wide expanse of waters is tossed to and fro by the fitful waves, so is a human being without a friend or home. He wanders from place to place until life is spent in doing nothing, and when he comes to die "his last state is worse than his first." Had he been surrounded by those interested in his welfare his life would have glided on smoothly, though swiftly. But we do not mean to say that we must expect many friends on earth. For how numerous are the instances in which men have lived who were despised by their fellow men, but who, had they been surrounded by power and wealth, would have gained the apparent if not the real friendship of many.

A parasitic friend may be compared to a flower while supported by the stem. It is then fresh and blooming, and appears to great advantage, but pluck it and soon its drooping head shows evidence of decay. In forming our friendships, then, we should discreetly choose such as are willing to share with their joys and bear a part of our sorrows, and who are not inferior to us in intellect, so that we may "hand in hand wind our way up the hill of life." But especially should we seek for those whose hearts are not corrupt. For, if we do not, we shall too plainly feel, and that perhaps too late, the truth that "evil communications corrupt good morals." If we place entire confidence in any they should be few, and those whose sentiments and our own agree. To know all this we should be long in learning their worth, for as a mountain is made up of atoms, so friendship is composed of little matters; and if the atoms hold not together the mountain must crumble into dust. Thus it is with friendship, for friends after the first misfortune too often fall away from us, as water from a fountain. It is always in our power to turn our friendships to advantage both to others and ourselves. For who will deny that friendship, when it is disinterested, contributes to the happiness of those by whom it is mutually cherished; that it alleviates if it does not remove afflictions, and that it sheds a cheering light through the clouds of misfortune by which human life is so often overcast.

Webster gives as one definition for the word jag, "a small load, as of hay or grain in the straw." Yes; a load of old rye, for instance, though not necessarily small.

Fairy Tales.

The charm of fairy tales survives the age for which they are written. Setting aside the scientific explanation of certain facts—such as the concealment of the name in stories of the Rumpelstilzkin class; proving this to be a mere survival of the old savage superstition which forbids a wife to utter her husband's name; which indeed hides the true name as part of the self that sorcery could hurt all the same as it could hurt the person by means of the hair, nails, etc.—setting aside, too, the still more recondite explanations which would lift these stories out of the region of fancy and affiliate them to the graver parentage of sun-myths and the like—the delight of the mere thing itself is as great as it was when we were children, and more than half believed such things had been if even they were not then. Fairy tales have every requisite that goes to make a good story. Simple in outline, they are vivid in description. Full of adventure, they are neither prolix nor disappointing. They have no wearisome introspection, no exhausting analysis of character or motives. The bad are as black as night, and have not so much as a glow-worm's amount of light to redeem them. The good are without flaw, and end in a blaze of glory, like a Covent Garden transformation scene. All the lovely princesses and charming young princes are made after the same pattern, with not even so much difference among them as there is in a row of wax dolls in a toy shop. They all have the same fault—curiosity and disobedience—and are sure to do the very thing they are told not to do, with the sweetest unconsciousness, the supremest indifference to their promise, and the most artless forgetfulness of threatened consequences. They never have the moral stature of full-grown human beings, and one never imagines them of the same height. They are manikins—dolls to suit the grasp and comprehension of the little people to whom they are addressed; and the verities of human nature are sent out into the desert, together with the possibilities of human life. A nursery without fairy books is as doleful a place as one without a furry rabbit to run up mother's arm when she takes it in her hand, or a cohort of dolls to share the joys, to lessen the griefs, and receive the secrets of the various little curly wigs who are their owners.

A Duel Stopped by St. Vitus' Dance.

In connection with Senator-elect Irby's duel in his younger days, Congressman John M. Allen, of Mississippi, tells of an amusing affair of honor in which he acted as second. There was bad feeling between two young lawyers in Mississippi, and it was decided that only blood could wipe out the enmity which existed. A challenge was sent and duly acknowledged. The hour was appointed and the two men met in a secluded spot. One of them was a great sufferer from St. Vitus' dance, the other was cool and collected. As they faced each other the afflicted man began to tremble from head to foot, while his pistol described an arc with varying up and down strokes. His opponent stood firm as a rock waiting for the signal to fire. Before it came, however, he laid his pistol on the ground, walked into the woods and cut a limb off a tree with a fork in the end of it. This he brought back and stuck in the ground in front of his antagonist. Then, turning to the second, he said: "I must request you to ask your principal to rest his pistol in that fork."

"What for?" asked his opponent's second. "Well," remarked the other, "I have no objections to running the risk of one shot, but I certainly do decline having one bullet make a honeycomb of me. If that man was to shoot while his hand is shaking the way it is now, he would fill me full of holes at the first shot."

This was too much for the seconds, and by mutual agreement a truce was patched up and no shots were exchanged.

Wonders of Littleness.

Both Pliny and Elian relate that Myrmecido wrought out of ivory a chariot with four wheels and four horses, and a ship with all its tackling, both in so small a compass that a bee could hide in them. Nor should we doubt this when we find it recorded in English history, on less questionable authority, that in the twentieth year of Queen Elizabeth's reign a blacksmith of London, of the name of Mark Scarliot, made a lock of iron, steel and brass of eleven pieces, and a pipe key, all of which weighed only one grain. Scarliot also made a chain of gold of forty-three links, which he fastened to the lock and key and put it around the neck of a flea, which drew the whole with perfect ease. The chain, key, lock and flea altogether weighed but one grain and a half.

In the light lexicon of the social sinner there is no such word as liar. When a charming woman glances with a suppressed cry of vexation at the card of an unwelcome caller, and a few minutes later sweeps into her reception room with outstretched arms and a so-good-of-you-to-come-on-her-smiling-lips—she has not lied. Her little fib is one of the multifarious venial sins which polite society not only condones, but exacts as proof of good breeding.

A Good One.

A young gentleman while looking over some papers the other day which were dated a good many years back, came across the following puzzle which will no doubt interest our readers:

Put down the day of month of your birth. Double it. Add 7. Multiply by 50. Add your age. Subtract 365. Multiply by 100. Add number of month of your birth. Add 1500.

The first two figures of result will be the day of your birth; the next two figures, your age; the last figure, the number of month of your birth.—Napa Journal.

LOCAL BREVITIES.

Bainbridge's College, J street, between Tenth and Eleventh, is unquestionably the best institution at which to obtain a business education on the Pacific Coast.

By investing a small sum, engaging yourself to a fair young lady, and marrying after one year, you get $500. Here is an opportunity for bachelors and spinsters. Read the advertisement of the Pacific Matrimonial Endowment Society in another column.

Scott & Gilbert, the manufacturing chemists, have a wider range of trade than any other firm in the State. Their goods are sold in all the Pacific Coast States and Territories, and many have found their way east of the Rockies. They are "Top Notch."

At the Sacramento Grammar School yesterday, patriotic exercises were held in honor of Washington's birthday. The programme was quite appropriate, and rendered creditably. Miss Mary J. Watson, the principal, has demonstrated the fact most conclusively that lady principals are a success.

The Union City Tribune, published at Union City, Washington, is under the management and editorial censorship of W. L. Hathaway, formerly of this city. We always knew there was something in "Billy," and the bright and spicy Tribune, one of the best papers in the northwest, fully bears us out in our assumption.

Judge Cravens, of the Police Court, bears down on criminals with a heavy hand. Where it was formerly ten to twenty days it is now six months. The loafing, thieving and disreputable element have taken alarm, and are leaving the city like rats from a sinking ship. "Limber" Green, however, will remain for several months, and will be fed at the expense of the county.

A Close Call for Bartells.

Perhaps no man is better known in Central and Northern California than William Bartells. Whole souled, generous and genial, he counts every man he knows his friend, and in this he is not mistaken. For a quarter of a century he traveled through the mining counties of this State in the interest of a firm in this city of which he was a partner. His collections were often large, and many times he traveled lonely roads with thousands in his pocket, yet he was never "stood up." He made a narrow escape, however, at one time, which the following, in his own language, will show: "I was in Sonora one day and collected $2,300. There was a Turn Verein picnic that day and I went out with some of my friends. We had a good time, spent money liberally, each man keeping his end up. When we returned to town we went around to the various saloons and hotels, as was the custom in those mining camps. I discovered a young man by the name of Moore and a young Mexican were shadowing us. I thought nothing of it, thought they wanted a glass of wine, and treated them nicely. At 12 o'clock I went to the hotel and told them to call me at 2 o'clock to take the stage. I then stepped into the private office to write some letters. It was a cold night; the fire was warm, the room most comfortable, and while writing I dropped to sleep. I awoke at 4 A. M., and when I looked at my watch I went out and upbraided the proprietor for not calling me. 'Well,' said he, 'we kicked your door in, but couldn't find you. However, you had better set them up for the boys, for the stage was robbed and you are safe.' I set them up for the boys," said Bartells, "for I considered that little nap had saved me over $2,000. Wells-Fargo's rates were very high, but I sent all my money next day by express. Moore and the Mexican were after me. They stopped the stage, the Mexican took a look inside the coach, illuminating each face with the light from a dark lantern, and when I was not to be found he exclaimed to his partner in crime, 'The d— Dutchman is not here.' None of the passengers were molested. The footprints clearly demonstrated the fact that Moore and the Mexican were the robbers and that they were after my sack."

None so little enjoy life and are such burdens to themselves as those who have nothing to do. The active only have the true relish of life. He who knows not what it is to labor, knows not what it is to enjoy. Recreation is only valuable as it unbends us. The idle know nothing of it. It is exertion that renders rest delightful and sleep sweet and undisturbed. The happiness of life depends on the regular prosecution of laudable purpose or calling which engages, helps and enlivens all our powers.

Noble works ought not to be printed in mean and worthless forms, and cheapness ought to be limited by an instinctive sense of law of fitness. The prestige of a book is the dress with which it walks into the world. The paper, type and ink are the body in which the soul is domiciled. And these three—body, soul and habilitment—are a triad which ought to be adjusted to one another by the laws of harmony and good sense.—Gladstone.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

On Monday and Tuesday, Feb. 23 and 24, Goodyear, Elitch and Schilling's Minstrels will occupy the Metropolitan. This is a new combination for this city.

Frederick Warde and Mrs. D. P. Bowers, with a very superior company, are giving the Sacramento theater lovers a genuine treat. On Thursday night Henry VIII was rendered in a most artistic manner. The theater was filled to its fullest capacity. To say that Warde was an ideal Woolsey is putting it gently. He was the real haughty Cardinal. The great scene of the play was the repulse of "Surrey" and his companions when they came to demand the "great seal." The act was grand. Mr. C. D. Herman is an artist and as "Buckingham" was truly affecting in the 3d act. He doubled as "Surrey." The trial scene of the Queen gave Mrs. Bowers the opportunity for her art, wherein she portrayed the innocent queen with all her great emotional and dramatic power. "Anne Boleyn" was in splendid hands. Miss Catharine Cogswell is a beautiful woman with fine dramatic abilities. Fred. Warde is one of the greatest living actors. Last night The Merchant of Venice and Katherine and Petruchio were given to a full house. This afternoon for matinee Virginus. To-night Macbeth, with Mrs. Bowers as "Lady Macbeth" and Warde as "Macbeth." We are glad of this opportune revival of the legitimate drama, which shows that it still has a place in the hearts of the lovers of art.

Our System.

Take, for instance, two thousand members, out of a community of 2,000 souls, have you ever heard of over 20 marriages in one year? To show that our society is founded on solid footing, we give the following problem, which any one can figure. If from a membership roll of 2,000 we assess 2,000 members four times each month, we can pay 8 Policies in full each month, or 96 Policies in one year, which you can readily see is far in advance of 20 marriages a year. With this membership we deduct 20 per cent. of each assessment for contingent expenses, but should this, with the dues, not be sufficient to meet the expenses, we only take the surplus of one full assessment above the full endowment.

The salaries of our officers are not large, as in other corporations and societies, neither is there a few who meet once a year and divide the profits, which is declared a dividend. The profits there are none unless you say that each member has his when he or she gets married, which in reality is a large profit to he or she.

Address all communications to the Secretary, 627 J Street, Sacramento, Cal.

JOIN THE SOCIETY NOW, AT ONCE.

The Reasons Why.

Because you are enabled, with the aid of your Benefit, to start life out of debt.

Because you are saving your money in small amounts, that you will not miss, and realizing a large profit.

Because at no other time is a small amount more acceptable than at your marriage, at which time you are under a great expense.

Because you are not compelled to wait for ten or fifteen years to receive a benefit, or do not have to die to win.

Because if you are not wealthy you can furnish your home without buying it on installments and paying four prices for the same.

Because it is a mutual society, from which the members derive the whole benefit.

Because every member helps to pay each endowment without missing the small amount of 50 cents.

Because there can not be more than 4 assessments in any one month, nor any assessment for a larger amount than 50 cents.

Because if there are,—which is not likely—full amount of assessments, and you are in five years you only pay in $140, and you draw out $500.

Because thus you have saved $140 in small amounts you have not missed, and you have doubled the original amount.

Because it is the best investment you can make on a small scale.

Because it pays better than savings banks, and is mutual; it helps all, and you can get $500 or one assessment for $32. You can not lose.

Because the money is invested where the best interest can be had, in bridges and so forth.

Because it will help you. Join now, at once; it will cost you no more than if you wait. Join at once.

Dues and Assessments.

Notice of dues and assessments will be sent to the last known address of the member. A member becomes delinquent when he receives two notices of dues and assessments, and if he or she does not respond, thirty days are allowed in which to do so.

Members should be particular to notify the Secretary of any change in his or her address. The first notice will be sent you, and after a lapse of fifteen days you will again be notified, when if we do not receive a response, your name will be stricken from our membership roll, and your Policy cancelled. Address all your communications to the Secretary, 627 J Street, Sacramento, Cal.

About our Agents.

The re authorized by us to collect the initiation fee and the first year's dues in advance, but make whoever accosts you show his certificate of agency, signed by either the Secretary, General Manager or General Agent. If he seems persistent, do not be harsh with him, remember he thinks he is working for your interest in getting you to join, and also that he is human.

Take out an application from the first Agent.

The Object of our Society.

It is to give every young man or woman over the age of 16 years, unmarried, a chance to invest his or her money in small amounts in such a manner that it will be of the most benefit to he or she. It certainly will be of the greatest good to any one to receive an endowment of Five Hundred Dollars at marriage, for at what other time in life is a small amount more acceptable. It is the time when we assume the greatest responsibilities of our lives. It is in a manner that no member suffers a large assessment to aid some brother or sister who has aided others.

You receive the benefit while you are alive and most active, and not like other societies where you have to die to win, and where you are paying in money all the time for some one else to receive the benefit of after your death. In this you receive Five Hundred Dollars, or the total amount of one assessment less 20 per cent, provided the assessment does not exceed $500, and that you have been a member for at least one year. This enables a young couple to make a clear start in life. Take out your Policy now. It will only cost you $8 00, with one year's dues in advance.

OUR SOCIETY IS MUTUAL.

The Annual Meeting

Of all members will be held on the first Monday after the second Tuesday in January of each year, for the election of officers and to transact whatever business that may come before the meeting. Each member will be entitled to one vote for each officer, and the officers elected will cast the vote of the remaining members, equally divided, who are not present.

Now is the Time to join. Don't wait until you are engaged and then have to put off your marriage for a year in order to derive a benefit from the Society, as you must be a member one year before you derive a benefit therefrom.

Join now. The initiation fee is only $5, and one year's dues only $3. Join at once, don't wait. Send in your application.

Atonement.

What ails you, my heart?
Are you sick? Are you sore?
Are you dead, or alive?
Though your plight I deplore,
I know not, for my part,
Why so poorly you thrive.
What ails you, my heart?

In your dawn, O my heart,
Like a musical wave
Of a fairy-land lake,
You danced blithe and brave.
Without thought, without art,
For sweet singing's sake,
You sang, O my heart.

In your morning, my heart,
You were loved, and did love,
With a glorious passion;
Part as angels above
Love God, and in part
In the sweet human fashion
Of youth, O my heart.

In your noon, O my heart,
You yearned for the light,
Your desire was for fame
In the battle for right.
You played a high part;
You won a pure name—
Then what ails you, my heart?

What is lacking, my heart?
What you craved has been given.
You have wrought; you have learned
Then what secret unshriven,
What ill beyond art,
What page yet unturned,
Mars your peace, O my heart?

Yet hear, O my heart!
Success is illusion,
To love is to lose,
And content is confusion.
Ask the gods to impart
All you vain would refuse—
All you fear, O my heart!

Ask for death, O my heart!
For that death bitter sweet,
That is quick in the grave,
And outlives life's defeat.
Only then will depart
This peace of the slave,
And true peace come, my heart.

Immortal, my heart,
Is your birth—is your fate.
Infinitely aspire
In bonds finite who wait.
Buy nor sell in earth's mart,
For the rose of desire
Is surrender, my heart!
—Julian Hawthorne.

An East Indian Mystery.

What is known as the "secret mail" of India has for more than a generation perplexed the English mind, and is still a profound mystery, although numberless attempts have been made to explain. Every one who has lived long in Asiatic countries is aware that the accurate knowledge of important happenings at a distance is often possessed by the natives a considerable time before it is obtained by the government, and even though special facilities had been provided for the transmission of the news.

This was frequently and conspicuously illustrated throughout the Sepoy rebellion. Happenings occurring hundreds of miles away were usually known in the bazars hours and sometimes days before the news reached the authorities, and the information obtained was regarded as so trustworthy that the natives speculated upon it even to the full extent of their fortunes. Indeed, upon one occasion the "secret mail" beat the government courier by fully twelve hours, although every endeavor had been made to secure the swiftest dispatch.

The Hindoos themselves say, when they consent to talk about it at all, that they depend neither upon horses nor men, and have no secret code of signals, but that they do possess a system of thought transmission which is as familiar to them as is the electric telegraph to the Western world. Any one may accept this explanation that will.

But, though most people with less fondness for the mysterious and a better knowledge of the weaknesses of the Hindoos for making riddles of the simplest facts, will look for a more prosaic explanation, it remains to be said that none has been forthcoming. The "secret mail" is an indubitable reality, and no Westerner has ever succeeded in solving its mystery.

If news is transmitted by signals no one has ever seen the signalers; nor if there is a vast system of stages in operation, covering hundreds and thousands of miles, has any one ever come across any of its machinery? And, indeed, it would seem that some means of communication must be at the command of the natives more rapid than horses or runners.

The earliest known lens is one made of rock crystal, unearthed by Layard at Nineveh. This lens, the age of which is to be measured by thousands of years, now lies in the British Museum, with its surface as bright as when it left the mazer's hands. By the side of it are very recent specimens of lenses which have been ruined by exposure to London fog and smoke.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California.—In the matter of the estates and guardianship of Mary F. and Walter J. Hennessy, minors. Elizabeth Hennessy, the guardian of the estates of Mary F. Hennessy and Walter J. Hennessy, minors, having filed her petition herein, duly verified, praying for an order of sale of the real estate of said decedent, for the purposes therein set forth, it is therefore ordered by the said Court that all persons interested in the estate of said decedent appear before the said Superior Court on the 6th day of March, 1891, at 10 o'clock A. M. of said day, at the Courtroom of said Superior Court, at County of Sacramento, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said guardian to sell so much of the real estate of the said minors as shall be necessary. And that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for three successive weeks in THEMIS, a newspaper printed and published in said county.

W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.

Dated February 4th, 1891.
C. T. JONES & MATT F. JOHNSON,
[fe7-4t] Attorneys for Petitioner.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California.—In the matter of Warren Starr, an insolvent debtor.—Warren Starr, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, from which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said Warren Starr is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said Warren Starr, insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent to him, or to any person, firm, corporation or association for his use; and the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Hon. A. P. Catlin, Judge of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Courtroom of said Court, in the County of Sacramento, on the 13th day of March 1891, at 10 o'clock A. M. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered, that the order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation, published in the County of Sacramento as often as the said paper is published, before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And it is further ordered, that in the meantime, all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated February 4th, 1891. W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.

W. A. ANDERSON, Attorney for insolvent.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to DAVID KIZER, greeting. You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 29th day of January, 1891, in which action, Annie Kizer is plaintiff, and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of said Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between plaintiff and defendant on the grounds of desertion and failure to provide; also, for the care, custody and control of the minor children, the issue of said marriage, viz: Nettie and Edna, aged 5 years, and 15 months respectively, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made; and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court, this 29th day of January A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.
By J. F. Dooby, Deputy Clerk.
W. A. GETT, Jr., Attorney for Plaintiff. j43-9t

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—In the Superior Court.—In the matter of the petition of W. C. Hays, an insolvent debtor. Upon reading and filing the petition, schedule and inventory of W. C. Hays, the above named petitioner, and on motion of L. S. Taylor, his attorney, it is ordered and declared that said petitioner is insolvent. And it is ordered that the Sheriff of the County of Sacramento do take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of said insolvent debtor (except such as may be by law exempt from execution), and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee. And all persons are forbidden to pay any debts to said debtor, or to deliver any property belonging to such debtor to him, or to any one for his use, and said debtor is forbidden to transfer any property to any one except said Sheriff. And it is further ordered that a meeting of all creditors of said debtor be held on Monday, the 9th day of March, 1891, at 10 o'clock A. M., at the court room of the Superior Court aforesaid, in the court house, in the City of Sacramento, to prove their debts, and choose one or more assignees of the estate, and that a copy of this order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation, as often as said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And all proceedings against the said insolvent are hereby stayed.

Sacramento, January 23, 1891. A. P. CATLIN,
Judge of the Superior Court.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of Harry Dewey, an insolvent debtor.—Harry Dewey, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said Harry Dewey is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate real and personal, of the said insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court room of said Court, on the 13th day of March, 1891, at 10 o'clock A. M. of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Wearers of Wooden Shoes.

A wagon load or more of wooden shoes, such as are worn by European peasants, lay at the door of a woodenware store on North Pennsylvania street the other day.

"Who wears 'em?" inquired the reporter, as he looked at the stock.

"More people than you would think," was the answer of the dealer, "and not only foreign-born, old-fashioned folks, but quite a number of the natives. Their chief sale is in winter; in fact, there is little or no demand for them at any other time. Our customers are dairymen, gardeners and farmers. Chicken cleaners, in the poultry houses, who stand in feathers and steam, wear them to save shoe leather.

"Gardeners' wives and daughters wear them about home, and sometimes in the severest weather wear them in the market. In the cold weather of three winters ago a number of street car drivers caught on to the fact that, while the shoes do not look well and are cumbersome, thought not as much as they look, they are warmer than other footwear.

"The drivers covered them with black cloth and tacked old bootlegs to the top and found that they had a protection for their feet that the cold could not overcome. A week ago Mr. Shearer of the Western Paving and Supply Company paid for two dozen for his workmen, as the hot asphalt is very destructive to leather."—Indianapolis Journal.

I kissed her. Yes, I will admit it,

We two were alone in the hall,
Her roses were red, and the perfume
Got into my head, that was all.

By Jove, but it wasn't my fault, man—
'Twas her own—she was ravishing fair;
Her lips were like rose leaves uncurling,
And her eyes were like stars, and her hair

Was as sweet as the breath of wild violets;
Lord love you, how could I resist!

A man's only human whatever,
And that woman was made to be kissed.

Gems from Richter.

Life is a beautiful night in which as one star goes down another rises.

Every virtuous and wise being is in himself a proof of immortality.

We carry and lock up a heaven of starry light within our own breasts.

That tenderest, kindest angel of the last hour, whom we harshly call death.

The stars burn as altar lights in the great temple of the night.

Fate manages poets as men do singing birds. We shroud the cage of the singer and make it dark, until at length he has caught the tunes and can sing them rightly.

The grandest of heroic deeds are those performed within the four walls and in domestic privacy.

No joy in nature is so sublimely affected as that of a mother over the good fortune of a child.

"O, ah, let me see, what do you give for a cold on the chest?" asked Jones, in a sort of indifferent tone, of a doctor with whom he was slightly acquainted, as he met him on the street. "Advice," was the laconic reply. So do we. We advise you not to neglect that hacking cough and drowsy feeling, the coated tongue, the failing appetite, the indigestion and general lassitude and debility—that "tired feeling," as so many express it. Take Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, in time, and it will not disappoint. It is not only the most wonderful alterative, or blood-cleanser, known to medical science, but also possesses superior nutritive and tonic or strength-giving properties. For Bronchial, Throat and Lung Diseases, accompanied with lingering coughs, the "Golden Medical Discovery" is absolutely unequalled as a remedy.

For Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, Short Breath, Consumptive Night-sweats, and kindred affections, it surpasses all other medicines. It's the only lung remedy, sold by druggists, guaranteed to benefit or cure, in every case, or money refunded.

for an incurable case of Catarrah in the Head, by the proprietors of Dr. Sage's Catarrah Remedy. By its mild, soothing and healing properties, it cures the worst cases, no matter of how long standing. Only 50 cents. Sold by druggists everywhere.

Epicurean.

There are sonnets to an eyebrow,
There are rondeaus to a shoe;
There are madrigals to duchesses
Whose nose and hose are blue;
There are ballads to the dairymaid
With her ankles in a brook,
But why don't poets write a rhyme
Or so about the cook?

A Womanly Woman.

When does lovely woman appear as lovely as when clad in a sweet dignity of manner?
And if to this she can add honors and decorations and degrees and titles, there is a Portia-like grace, serenity and magnetism about her that is wholly irresistible.
The day of helpless, incapable women has gone by.
Men and all the rest of the world like a woman who has something to her, who knows something and who can sustain her own in a delightful interchange of thought.

Do not think, dear, sweet little girl, that you must wear calfskin boots and a divided skirt and a self-assertive manner. Nor that you need go clad in the armor of aggressiveness, carrying a pucky shield of sharp opinions. But what you do need is to make yourself attractive, is to cultivate all your little gifts and talents, and to make the most of the womanliness that is within.

Have you seen the lovely statue of the Princess of Wales as Doctor of Music? If you have, you remember the calm, sweet, stately features, above which the "mortar-board" cap sets as royally as if it were a crown.
You know how the long, heavy doctor's robe falls to the feet in great dignified folds that only serve to enhance the queenly bearing of the woman. The statue is a powerful one and a strong one, yet it is that of a woman, and it is all womanly. Prince Victor of Hohenlohe Langenburg, a cousin of the Princess, made it, and he well knew how to draw the firm lines, curved and sweet, that are part of a womanly woman's make-up.

Things Swallowed.

The Lewiston man who swallowed a physician's atomizer the other day has had many sympathizers. An impecunious wretch who accosted him soon after said "That's nothing. I swallowed a brick block in to-cant drinks." The remark was old, but the accompanying request for a to-cent loan was new. A jeweler on Lisbon street, who is trustworthy and will back this over his signature, says that he knows a man in Lewiston who swallowed a large piece of iron, very large, dimensions not given; but so large that it almost destroyed his equilibrium, and when he lay down this bit of hard ware rolled around internally in accompaniment to his own turnings. It was with him for years, gradually absorbing, until, presto, change! it was gone, a masterly piece of digestion, without doubt. No affidavit accompanies this story of the evaporation of cold iron, but it would be no injury to its good effects if there were. The meanest trick that the epiglotis has done of late, however, is to an Auburn storekeeper, who was about to open store the other day and held the key, a very small one, in his mouth for a moment, when he unfortunately slipped on the door and swallowed it (the key not the door). He waited for his partner to open up. A pretty girl who was about to pay the conductor in the street car (Pine-street route) last Thursday, suddenly blushed and then turned pale. She had swallowed a to-cent piece. — Lewiston Journal.

Love Bracelets.

If a young man has any true regard for a woman he gives her a gold ribbon bracelet, perfectly plain, save for an inscription, and clasps it upon her arm. It should lock and the key be carried by him who purchased it. These are not of necessity engagement bracelets; they mean, merely, true regard and a desire that this state of feeling shall continue.

If regard has deepened into love, and a blessed feeling of possession, a little verse is inscribed upon the bracelet, telling to all who care to read that two more lives have been made happy in loving each other.

A pretty verse upon a New Year engagement bracelet ran thus:

The violet loves a sunny bank,
The cowslip loves the lea,
The scarlet creeper loves the elm
And I love—three

The Purity of Gold.

The purity of gold is estimated by an Abyssinian weight called a carat (Arabian quirrat, a bean, the fruit of the crab tree), which is subdivided into four parts called grains. The term carat when applied to gold and silver is not a weight unit, but the mode of expressing the purity or fineness of the metal in twenty-fourths. Thus eighteen carat gold is metal in which eighteen parts out of twenty-four (or three-fourths) are pure gold. This method of estimating fineness is traceable from the mares of Europe having been divided into twenty-four real carats, or actual weight units. The present method is to estimate fineness in thousands, i. e., gold 750 fine has 350 parts alloy, corresponds to eighteen carat gold, three quarters of the metal being pure gold in each case. Our gold coins are 21.19 carats.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
J. H. MILLER, Managing Editor.

There is such a thing in modern politics as the insincerity, if not absolute dishonesty, of minorities, from the National Congress down to the State Legislatures, even including the local municipal administrations. This has been forcibly evinced in the present Legislature on a number of reform, or alleged reform, measures. But what we set out to say in this article is the status of local municipal politics. The great Republican party, through a large and thoroughly representative body of our foremost citizens, has presented a declaration of principles unexceptionable, and with a ticket composed of the best trained and qualified men for the several official trusts. Nothing can be truthfully urged against either.

Notwithstanding this state of affairs, we find those who, to further personal aspirations, and without regard to good government, are trying to raise false issues, in order that the lessons of the past may be repeated in the selection of incompetent men for public trusts. Nothing has been said about sumptuary laws, or high license for liquor dealers, yet some there are who are endeavoring to interpolate this dead issue in the local campaign. If this is prompted by saloon men it is certainly illy advised, and they may be in the act of invoking a storm that will strew the whirlwind's harvest about them. There is no disposition to tax any man's business out of existence, and the subterfuges now urged by those indiscreet men cannot result in any good, or tend to select honest and capable men for municipal affairs. It is always time enough to fight an issue when it is presented, and the safest course to pursue by liquor dealers, is to let this question severely alone. It is not an honest means of contest at this time, and is only intended to further the interest of some incompetent person or persons for preferment upon false pretenses.

As we have said, each and all of our candidates, Conklin, Young, Buckley, Putnam, Weil and Miller, are broad gauge, liberal minded men, who are not wedded to any ultra isms or schemes. A glance at the record of each of these men cannot fail to develop the fact of their broad views on all local affairs. Citizens of Sacramento, you cannot afford to allow yourselves to be deceived by false issues.

It is a duty that people owe to one another, to render their social intercourse productive of a mutual benefit. This, however, will never be, unless there is adopted in the family circle where friends are in the habit of meeting some regular plan which shall guide, without fettering, the conversation; and which, while it gives an instructive tone, need not interfere with its discursiveness, or suitableness to all comprehensions. Nothing would be more simple, and nothing productive of more lasting usefulness to this and succeeding generations. There are few families, in the present age of unprecedentedly cheap literature, without the means of commanding a supply of valuable and well-written books; and it would not be very difficult for the elder members of the household to establish a rule that every evening, when gathered round the fireside, and not otherwise engaged in any important business, some book, or scientific discovery, or work of art, or historical event, should be calmly discussed by the entire circle. It may be answered that there are many individuals in a family, who, from unfortunate defects of education, would not possess either the inclination or ability to join in such a discussion; but this, we think, would tend to disclose the advantages of such a system. When such a person sees himself excluded from so much intellectual enjoyment; when he finds himself cut off from communion with other intellects, the deficiencies, of which he was until then careless, will sit heavily upon him. He will grow ashamed, be humiliated; and if it happens—as it will happen in nine cases out of ten—that he possesses any moderate share of pride or self esteem, there is little doubt that he will set himself to work seriously to repair those mental defects of whose existence he had before been scarcely conscious. Moreover, such discussions need not be always confined to abstruse subjects. That would only make the circle pedants. A pedantic family is detestable. But music, painting, poetry, sculpture, biography, travels, cum multis aliis, might all be taken in the round, and made to yield a profitable return. Again, every member, however inexperienced or unlearned, should be heard with attention; for as there is no flower, however humble, from which the bee will not extract honey, there is no mind so unlimited or unlightened from which we may not gather some fruit to be garnered in our memories. Nor does it follow that the topics introduced should always be treated profoundly, for a continual gravity would soon put enjoyment out of the question. It was Pitt, we think, who said, "I would not give a fig for a man who was not able to talk nonsense." And the great statesman knew very well what he was saying, for it requires a positive amount of genius to talk nonsense well. A clever man will talk it for hours, and yet make it entertaining, perhaps instructive; and all the time his audience can see perfectly well that he could talk wisdom just as easily if he chose. There need be no necessity, then, for the debates we are recommending to be wrapt always in intense gravity. A subject should now and then be started which would admit of being treated in a volatile manner; and depend upon it, a little clever persiflage would enable the circle to return with renewed zest to profounder topics. However, beyond all such things, we would advocate the fireside debates. With young people they would be productive of the purest benefits. They would teach them that patience and temper are necessary to conduct any sort of discussion properly; and, finally, by bringing the minds of the various members of the family into constant intercourse with one another, by displaying the acquirements of some and the deficiencies of others, it would lead to a wholesome emulation on the side of the uneducated to rise to a level with the more gifted; while it would afford these latter an opportunity of proving their kindness and good nature by assisting their fellow laborers in their praiseworthy efforts with their advice and counsel, and thus by drawing the bonds of union closer, the whole family would be linked together in social ties that nothing could sever, because they would be spun from the heart and strengthened by the intellect.

It is a noted fact that men talk most eloquently in the presence of women. As we took occasion to say a short time ago, this is one of the reasons why women should be admitted to our "feasts of reason and flow of soul"—even if it does include the flow of wine. Now, on the other hand, women never talk at their best except in the presence of men. Women talking together waste themselves on small talk and gossip, but while in conversation with men they reach a more exalted strain, and bend their best energies toward entertainment. Women generally are great readers, and it is gratifying for them to find some medium whereby they can enlist the interest of masculine brains. As a matter of fact, women will not listen to the real wisdom of other women, while men are great admirers of the pretty way a woman has of displaying her learning. There is not enough of this interchange of thought between the sexes. If there was, very much of this society small talk would give place to a healthy and vigorous expression of valuable information, one to the other. From the hum of frivolous comment on her neighbors' bonnet, or the latest scandal, there would be useful interchange of thought.

You never talked with a young woman ten minutes in your life, but that she would speak of love. How few women have ever been in love. How few ever marry from election. They marry because they are asked and because the marriage is suitable. It is their vocation to be married, parents approve and they have no other attachment. Any observant person living in society, where there is a continual marrying and giving in marriage, must be struck with this fact. Cupid's quiver must be exhausted or his arrow blunt, as he pierces few hearts now. We think a girl really in love, one who has the evident symptoms of the malady, would be thought very improper; yet we have often fancied that there must be a man born in the world for every woman; one whom to see would be to love, to reverence, to adore; one with whom her sympathies would entirely blend, that she would recognize him at once as her true lord. Now and then these pairs come together, and wo to her who meets this other self too late. Women would be more merciful if they did not, through ignorance and thoughtlessness, measure the temptations of others by their own own experience.

Hope stole on its pinions of snow to the bed of disease, and the sufferer's frown became a smile; the emblem of peace and endurance. It went to the house of mourning, and from the lips of sorrow there came sweet and cheerful song. It laid its head upon the arm of the poor, which was stretched forth at the command of unholy impulse, and saved him from disgrace and ruin. It dwelt like a living thing in the bosom of the mother, whose son tarried long after the promised time of his coming, and saved her from desolation and the "care that killeth." It hovered about the head of the youth who had become the Ishmael of society, and led him onward to works which even his enemies praised. It snatched a maiden from the jaws of death, and went with an old man to heaven. No hope! my good brother? Have it! Record it on your own side! Wrestle with it, that it may not depart. It may repay your pains. Life is hard enough at best, but hope shall lead you over its mountains, and sustain thee amid its billows. Part with all beside, young man, but keep thy hope.

The modest, retiring girl is the ideal even of the "fast" young man. She sometimes makes the mistake of her life and marries him. Care for your daughters in the old-fashioned way. By doing this you may save them and protect society. If this is not done you surrender your right of self-defense. Society must begin at the cradle to protect itself.

SUTTER'S MILL.

At the present time vigorous efforts are being made to preserve what is left of Sutter's fort, and we hope it will be successful. S. W. Sanderson, at one time Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of California, afterwards the head of the law department of the C. P. R., wrote the following for the Empire County Argus, published at Coloma, which appeared in that paper on the 13th of May, 1854:

"Greece and Rome are held dear to the scholar on account of the classic association which cluster around its ancient history, telling of deeds of valor in the tented field, or of high attainments in those arts and sciences which have justly made them the envy, and excited the emulation of the world. The Mohammedan, in his reverence to the history of his religion, makes his pilgrimage to the holy shrine of his prophet, and reverently bows in devotion, while he praises Allah for the privilege. Other nations have their classic associations, the mention of which thrills the hot blood through the veins like electricity and warms the heart's emotions. Our sister States of the Atlantic slope—the homes of our childhood's happy days—are the peculiar dwelling places of classic lore and legendary association. From the Aroostook to the Rio Grande, teeming history wells up associations dear to the American heart, and in whatever situation he may be placed causes him to rejoice that he breathes the free air of heaven in the 'land of the free and home of the brave.' California, too, the youngest and brightest star in the galaxy of the associated States—the giant of the Pacific and home of chivalrous devotion to the Union—the land of untiring perseverance and indomitable energy, where cities and towns spring up by magic, and people as if by enchantment—where mighty conceptions are promulgated and executed by unparalleled rapidity—she, too, has her classic ground. Her ancient inhabitants are fast melting away, their history unwritten, their legends unrecorded. Whatever might be grand, heroic, or sublime in their nation's characteristics, individual capacity passes off with the actors. Their deeds, and soon themselves,

Like the dew on the mountain,
The mist on the river,
The spray on the fountain,
They are gone, and forever.

But their places are supplied by a population whose touch beautifies and adorns the land—whose conceptions are mighty—whose energy removes every barrier to greatness, and whose vaulting and laudable ambition will make this State the empire of greatness. The necessary pre-requisites are already within her borders, and additions are constantly making to them from the older States in the choicest intellect and finest talent of our country. In our honored career to greatness, renown and glory, we should not forget the spot nor the associations which consecrated this land to the American people and brought the teeming masses of civilization to these shores, to overcome the natural fastnesses of the country, and to develop the resources buried deep within her bosom. Co-extensive with the name of California, and her unbounded wealth, is the name of Sutter's Mill—the prominent classic ground of California.

'Twas here was unearthed from midst the sand, the "golden ore" which has so effectually revolutionized the American world, and makes our mountains and valleys teem with life, energy and activity. The accidental discovery of gold at Sutter's Mill was the commencement of a new era in the affairs of the world—the opening of a wide and extensive field of enterprise, which has so infused new life into every department of society. So sudden and electrical has been the influences, so powerful and prompt their application, that weeks accomplished in this State the works of years in any other portion of the world.

The magic changes which have taken place in this country would astonish any but a Californian to witness. The past, however, is but a brief index to the future. If we have sprung into existence, as a State, full grown, without infancy or childhood, the first page of our history has scarcely commenced to be written. In our swift progress to eminence—in the rushing that bears us on to the niche of fame which destiny has marked out for us to occupy—in the struggle for wealth, and our ambitious longings, we should remember our classic ground—Sutter's Old Mill.

The race, so celebrated in story, and the digging of which proved so pregnant in the history of our times, is filled up, useless. The clatter of the wheel is stilled, probably never again to reverberate upon the ear—the saw and other trappings are removed. The hand of the Goth is removing portions of its structure for holy relics, as mementos of pilgrimages to its shrine. The sturdy frame still stands a waymark to the wanderer, a fit representative of the past, an object of solicitude for the future.

Its history is classic. Amid the changes which are continually going on in our midst—the leveling propensities of the age—the velocity of the progression of the American people, it would be well to preserve some vestige of the past. A relic to open the pages of our early history; and what more fitting emblem could be preserved than Sutter's Mill? It is at the present time an object of curiosity, and will continue to become more so.

As time progresses this spot will become more attractive, and consequently numerous visitors will congregate here, to examine the place where gold was first discovered, and to take a look at the old mill. Who will dispute its claims to be in classic grounds?"

SOME UNWRITTEN HISTORY.

Sacramento in Embryo—How Government was Established from Chaos.

PART XVIII.

The election noted in our last number of this series seems to have infused new life into the City Council. The business done by it on Nov. 20, shown in our last number, indicates that, and it again assembled Nov. 23d, 1849. After its charter had been adopted at the meeting of Oct. 13, 1849 (Part XV of this series), the personnel of the Council considerably changed. Probably the charter gave the power to the council to declare and fill vacancies. November 23 there were present only A. M. Winn, President; Chapman, White, Gillespie and Rogers.

The committee which had been constituted to investigate in relation to the probability of inundation of the city not being ready to report, were granted further time. The captains of vessels lying at the port of Sacramento, not being satisfied with the operation of the ordinance on the subject of harbor dues, had petitioned for certain changes, and the committee to which that petition had been referred, reported sundry amendments to the ordinance, which were agreed to. At the meeting of the 23d Nov. Councilman H. E. Robinson tendered his resignation, which was accepted by the Council. Mr. Smith was elected to succeed him. Councilman Jennings, not attending regularly to his duties, was by order of the Board removed, and E. J. C. Kewen was elected to succeed him, and thereafter these two new members were very active in directing the municipal affairs of the city till their successors came into office.

These two new members took their oaths of office at an evening session. Mr. Chapman, who had up to the 23d Nov. acted on the committee for the relief of the sick, resigned his place on that committee and Mr. Smith was put in his place. The City Council had by ordinance provided for the election of a Health Officer, and defining his duties. The Council at this meeting elected Dr. F. J. White to fill that office, which he filled until a new charter was adopted. At first his headquarters were at a room in the fort. Afterwards he had an office on L street, near Seventh, and in the latter part of 1849 and the fore part of 1850, the house formerly used by Samuel Brannan (marked B on diagram in Part VI, THEMIS, Nov. 23, 1889), was occupied as a hospital. It is evident that the members of the City Council were willing to take to themselves all the offices which the exigencies of the public good required, as at this meeting of the 23d the Council proceeded to the election of a Board of Health, and on counting the ballots it was found that Councilmen Kewen, Smith, Rogers and Chapman had been duly elected, and the President (A. M. Winn) was authorized to procure and furnish to all officers the necessary books.

The Board, on motion of Dr. White, directed the Harbormaster to equalize his collections by returning to the captains of vessels such part of any money collected by him as would make such collection conform to the new schedule of rates of harbor dues. The City Council had some difficulty in adjusting the compensation of J. C. Zabriskie, City Attorney, for his services, and this matter was referred to a committee consisting of Councilmen Rogers, Kewen and White, and the Council resolved that thereafter it would meet regularly, at 6 o'clock each Saturday night.

Accordingly, it met on the 24th day of November, 1849. Present: A. M. Winn, President; Smith, Kewen, Gillespie. The committee on the account of J. C. Zabriskie reported that the unpleasantness of the duty imposed on them was equalled only by the difficulty of an adjustment, which it is hoped will satisfy the demands of the creditor and at the same time not prejudice the interests of the city. The account upon which the committee is required to deliberate is addressed to the President and City Council of Sacramento city, and is composed of the following items for the several amounts attached, to which the said body is represented to be indebted to James C. Zabriskie: To drawing ordinance relating to the occupation of streets, alleys, etc., $100; to drawing city charter, $1,000; ordinance relating to public offices, $100; three hearings and two arguments in the case of The City of Sacramento vs. Jenness, $500; to preparation of ordinance of streets, ordered by committee but not called for, $200; to advice at different times on various subjects by committee of City Council, $500. Total, $2,400.

Your committee upon due deliberation, and from the best advice they could obtain in relation to the value of such services are constrained to believe that the demand is too exorbitant to comport with the duty of the City Council to allow.

The more are they convinced of the fact when in view of the impoverished condition of the city finances, every member of this body almost daily performs similar services for which they receive no remuneration whatever.

They conclude, therefore, and not without adequate counsel from proper sources, that the following sums will be a fair, just and liberal compensation for all the labor performed by the said creditor in behalf of the City Council: For the first item, $16.00; for the second item, $100.00; for the third item, $32.00; for the fourth item, $500.00; for the fifth item, $32.00; making in all, the sum of $680.00.

The committee refused to allow any part of the last items, because the charge is too indefinite and general in its charter. That the advice spoken of was understood to be gratuitous, and the said committee under a different belief would not have imposed upon the city the payment of any amount.

The report was not acted upon at the meeting of the 23d, but it was recorded and the committee discharged.

Councilman Cornwall having been elected a member of the Assembly to meet at Monterey on the 15th of December, then next resigned his position as Councilman, and his resignation was accepted, and the City Council thereupon elected Dr. Miles as his successor.

The Harbormaster reported to the City Council the collection of $334.90 from vessels at the city front, and the account of Drs. Hungerford and Bryant for services rendered in the hospital to one Richard Johnson, was presented and allowed.

It was further resolved that thereafter all petitions and memorials to the President and Councilmen be in writing.

The Committee on Hospital Building was directed to select a suitable site for a hospital.

The City Council again met November 28th.

A committee appointed to devise a system of finance and taxation submitted its report, fixing rates of licenses for wholesale or wholesale and retail dealers in goods, wares and merchandise, per month, $50.00; retail dealers, $25.00; hotels, eating houses, $50.00; drinking shops and coffee houses, $50.00; each faro and monte table, $30.00; and all other gaming tables, $20.00; each billiard table, $20.00; bowling alleys, $10.00; auctioneer with merchant license, $25.00; auctioneer without merchant license, $50.00; exchange brokers, $50.00; theaters, $20.00; meat markets, $50.00. The above was the cost of license per month. Theaters, concerts, etc., per night, $5.00.

The report was adopted, and it was ordered the same shall go into effect and have the authority of an ordinance from the date of adoption, and approved by the Council at a meeting of the City Council.

At this meeting of the City Council important action was taken concerning the City Cemetery.

Committeemen Winn and Rogers, to whom that matter had been referred, reported that in conjunction with the City Engineer they had selected as a good location, a tract of land situated between Ninth and Eleventh, south of Y street, so to be laid off as to contain 10 acres. That the attorney of Capt. Sutter, H. A. Schoolcroft, is willing and proposes to donate to the city for the purpose of a city cemetery, the site to be selected, and the committee recommended that the City Engineer be instructed by the committee to lay off into lots the said land as a cemetery, and that the same be set apart for that purpose.

This report was agreed to and forms a basis for the title of the city to its cemetery plot.

The Committee on Buildings and Hospital reported that it had selected the north side of the public square, lying between Ninth and Tenth, I and J streets, as an appropriate site on which to erect the building. The committee say it is high, rolling ground, and according to the opinion of our worthy health officer, it is the most suitable spot belonging to the city, and it asked the City Council to confirm the selection. The committee also reported that it has commenced the building, the lumber and labor of which has been thus far something over $6,000, all of which has been paid or assumed by the President of the Council. The committee recommend a direct appropriation of $7,000 that the President (Mr. Winn) may be reimbursed. The committee also recommended that Governor Wiley be requested to appropriate a similar amount for that purpose, subject to the order of the President of the City Council.

This report was read and agreed to. But, notwithstanding this action, the building did not materialize. The $6,000 spent or assumed by the President did not go into brick and mortar or lumber for the building. The President did not get the $7,000 from Governor Riley, and so far as the records disclose, the $7,000 remained in the city treasury.

The Council then adjourned and did not again convene with a quorum till the regular meeting, Saturday, December 6, 1849.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

The Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage still continues to attract not less than 3,500 people every Sunday evening at the Academy in New York, where the eminent preacher is conducting divine services under the auspices of the Christian Herald.

Miss Eleanor Clausen, musician and orchestra leader, is considered one of the best women conductors in London. Although born in England she is of Swedish extraction, and comes from a line of musicians. She is twenty-one years of age, and the members of her Pompadour band, twenty in number, are Guildhall students.

The vaunted glories of a star's position in a theatrical company received a rude shock in New York last week. After seven performances, the subordinates of the company were happy in the possession of their full salaries, while the boss twinkler drew from the box office as his share of the week's profits just three dollars and twenty-five cents.

It is said that Sheridan wrote The School for Scandal in a single night. Denman Thompson and George W. Ryer were nearly two years engaged in arranging the exquisite Old Homestead. The former play has just been revived by Daly, while the latter betrays no sign of flagging interest, although it is now in its fourth year at the one playhouse, the Academy, New York.

They were two real bad young men, and they had gone out to get a clove between the second and third acts of Mr. Potter of Texas. "Say," remarked the first bad young man to his companion, "his Potters is a looloo, ain't he?" "Outersite," replied the second bad young man; "but yorterssee his wife. She played in Antony and Cleopatra once up to Palmer's, and she wasn't in it." And of such are the stories of histrionic fam.—N. Y. World.

The Pittsburg Dispatch man tells this story: A good many years ago a minstrel company stranded in New Orleans, and among those who wanted to get work and hadn't the price of a street-car fare, were Lew Brimmer and Morrissey, the singer. These two knew a river captain, however, and they worked upon his sympathies so skilfully that at last he consented to take them part of the way home anyhow. Brimmer and Morrissey, and their wives, accordingly got on board the boat, and they kept in the Captain's good graces until they were above Cairo. Then, for some reason or other, the Captain said he must put them ashore. They all pleaded with him, but in vain. The gang plank was out, and Morrissey and Brimmer had walked ashore, and their wives, weeping bitterly, were about to follow, while the Captain sternly watched the movement from the hurricane deck. Morrissey and Brimmer had their banjos out, and at this pathetic moment they rolled up their trousers, pulled off their shoes and, stepping into the river, began to sing, in the most plaintive fashion: "We Parted by the River Side." They had sung a few bars when the Captain shouted from the hurricane deck: "Get on board, you confounded rascals." And, sure enough, he took them to Pittsburg without another murmur.

Book Chat.

Mrs. Kate Tannatt Woods, of Salem, Mass., has been elected a member of the London Society of Authors.

People who are fortunate enough to possess first editions of Burns will do well to send them into the market while the craze lasts. A copy which sold for £66 in 1887, sold for £120 last season.

How to Write Philosophy.—"I'm going to write a book on general philosophy," said Bowles. "What do you know about philosophy?" exclaimed Knowles. "Nothing; but all I have to do is to say something I don't understand myself, or cannot make any one else understand."

The New York World takes some of our imitators to task severely: The truth is that real American fiction has been obscured by American imitators of foreign literature and by literary photographers. We have among us a horde of clever vampires who are governed by the worst traditions of French novel writing. It is unnecessary to complain of the imitators of English writers, beyond expressing a wish that they might succeed a little better. If we could have an American delineation of rural life as rich as that of Hardy it would be agreeable, but it is impossible. Ages of caste and generations of family stability have gone to the making of the English clown. There is none like him here. The nearest approach to him is the half-savage, half-nourished Georgia cracker or New England mountaineer. American colonial history might receive the sympathetic treatment which Blackmore has given to English history, and the time is coming when the background will have taken on the tone of age sufficiently to permit it. There can be no complaint of any American writer who will tell stories as well as the best of the Englishmen. With the nasty imitators of the worst French fiction, however, the case is different. They are simply detestable. The English tongue is not fitted to their purpose. It cannot be licentious except in honest bestiality. Compared with the French in this respect it is like the periodical drunkard compared with the constant sipper of absinthe. The posing of the creatures who write the nauseous stuff as American authors is an insult to the country they misrepresent and an injury to the better men and women who are doing honest and worthy work.

Professional Chat.

It is not every client who is able to keep his own counsel.

"My client, your Honor," said the lawyer, "cannot be guilty of bigamy. We admit the marriage with the first alleged wife. The second marriage was in itself null and void because of the previous one—in fact, was no marriage. Hence, as you will see at once, there were not two marriages, and therefore, no bigamy."

The Czar of Russia is a perfect specimen of physical manhood. He is more than six feet tall and has the shoulders, arms and thighs of an athlete. So great is the strength of his hands that he can twist a horsehorse with ease. He is a magnificent horseman, a thoroughly trained soldier and an accomplished linguist, speaking seven modern languages besides Russian. He works hard and is out of bed from six in the morning till ten at night.

The following burst of eloquence was delivered before a court of justice in Pennsylvania: "Your Honor sits high on the adorable pedestal of justice, like the Asiatic rock of Gibraltar, while the eternal river of mercy, like the cadaverous of the valley, flows meandering at your feet."

The following is the commencement of a speech of a New Jersey lawyer: "Your Honors do not sit there like marble statues, to be waited to and fro by every windy breeze."

Another disciple of Blackstone, in arguing before a Missouri justice said: "The Court will please to observe that the gentleman from the East has given him a very learned speech. He has roamed with old Romulus, socked with old Socrates, ripped with Euripedes, and canted with old Cantharides, but what in the devil does he know about Pike county justice?"

A Mississippi attorney in his argument relieved himself of the following: "May it please the Court, I would rather live for thirteen hundred centuries on the small end of a thunderbolt, chew the ragged edge of a flash of lightning, swallow the corners of a Virginia worm-fence, and have my bowels torn out by a green briar than to be thus bamboozled by those gentlemen."

Everybody knows what a jovial disposition belongs to Prof. J. H. C. Bonte. While the reverend gentleman had charge of the Episcopal flock in this city, there were times when the financial condition of the vestry was not at par. During one of these financial straights the Professor was compelled to let his grocery bill run up to a considerable figure. The groceryman was, however, a member of the vestry. One day the merchant called Mr. Bonté into the store, reminded him that the provision account was large and overdue. Now, the Professor was known to be equal to any emergency, and his persuasive powers very great. Not having been supplied by his vestry with the necessary funds to liquidate the merchant, he turned his jovial nature to account, and with a bold front said: "Mr. R——, if you insist upon dunning me for this bill, I, sir, will borrow $200 from you." This declaration startled the merchant, who knew too well that if the Domine took it into his head to borrow $200 from him he would most certainly accomplish that end. He at once changed the subject, and after asking about the flock, got rid of his surmiser as quick as possible. "Whew," said the merchant, "I had a narrow escape."

"Out of Kilter."

Kilter or kelter was an "Anglicism" long before it was an "Americanism." Skjuner, in 1671, has "Kelter; he is not yet in kelter; nondum est paratur." It is also given in a reprint of Ray's Collection, of 1691. The k before i points to a Scandinavian origin. Cf. Dan. "kilte," to truss, tuck up, whence E. "kilt." Reitz gives Swed. dial., "kilter-band," a band for holding up tucked-up clothes; "kilter-sig," to gird up, tuck up and fasten. The metaphor is obvious enough.

This word "kelter," as it should be spelled, is given in Johnson's dictionary, and derived from the Danish "kelter," to gird. A quotation is given from Barrow's works, where the word is used. Bailey, in his etymological dictionary, derives it from the Latin cultura. Halliwell (Dictionary of Archaic and Provincial Words) gives it as used in the east of England, both as a substantive and as a verb. It is a word of every day use in Surrey and Sussex, in the sense of order or condition. The Rev. W. D. Parish, in his "Dictionary of the Sussex Dialect," notices it in the phrase, "this farm seems in very good 'kelter.'" I have often heard it used in the same way, and anything that is out of condition is described as being out o' 'kelter.' On reference to the publication of the "English Dialect Society," it will be seen that the word is of very general use throughout England. In the neighborhood of Whitby it occurs as a verb and a substantive, and in the Mid and East Yorkshire glossaries, also. It is also in West Cornwall, Hampshire and the Isle of Wight, in West Somerset, in Sheffield, and in Huddersfield the word means money. These references will be sufficient to show that the expression is not an Americanism, but that the word has found, and still finds a place in vernacular English.

THE BLUE CHAMBER.

A small party of ladies and gentlemen engaged in conversation were sitting after dinner in the spacious grounds of an ancient manor.

Suddenly one of the party began to relate an anecdote of a ghost he had seen. Several tales followed; but the young daughter of the house, Anna, continued to ask for more. It was so amusing to hear these marvellous stories, imagine the black and white specters moving noiselessly in dense shadow of dazzling moonlight! She could not endure Candidate Holst's way of telling these stories; his scornful comments tore ugly rents in the dreamy veil in which she wrapped herself.

He was a medical student and had witnessed many similar things in the hospital. It was owing to sickness acting upon different individuals.

A person in a healthy, normal condition never saw ghosts. The whole party opposed his view. The mistress of the house gently interposed. It is very difficult to release ourselves from the ideas in which we were reared and which our ancestors believed. "I am far from what is called superstitious; I have never been in contact with these strange spirits—yet not for all the world would I sleep in the blue chamber."

"The blue chamber!" cried the whole party in tones of astonishment.

"Yes, we have here, as in so many old manor houses, a room that is said to be haunted. Many hundred years ago a man was murdered there, and the servants talk of strange sounds and sights; none of them like to pass it after dark."

"I should be delighted to occupy a real haunted chamber," said Holst, quietly. "It is a sin to have it unused forever. Perhaps I can help dispel this foolish superstition, for I am convinced I shall sleep undisturbed."

At first the mistress of the house would not listen to such a plan, but when the whole party urged she at last yielded.

After supper the whole party went to the "blue chamber," which meantime had been put in order to receive the ghost. Every corner was examined with the utmost care.

"It is not impossible," said Holst, after a thorough examination of the chamber, "that the nocturnal noises mentioned may have been made by vagabonds who settled themselves here for a comfortable night's rest. Victor, do me the favor to get my pistols; they are in my traveling satchel; but don't meddle with the triggers, they are loaded."

Victor went away with a light, and soon after brought the pistols to his brother. The latter primed them freshly, put on new caps and laid them on the table.

"Now, good night, ladies and gentlemen, I wish you all as comfortable a rest as I expect to have myself."

As they went out, Victor whispered to Anna, "I'll answer for it that he shall be thoroughly frightened."

The door was locked, and Candidate Holst remained alone in the blue chamber. The sound of footsteps and voices died away; he listened at the door, but all was silent.

"So a man was murdered here, and for the sake of this legend the room has now stood empty hundreds of years. If one could see a few blood stains or similar horrors, but there is no trace of anything of the sort. What matchless power superstition has, even in our enlightened days! I shall consider it a good deed to drive it from this comfortable stronghold."

While thus soliloquizing he undressed, opened the canopy bed, and resolutely extinguished the lamp.

There was no sound in the room. He lay listening a moment, heard the night winds sigh through the trees and the great clock of the manor strike 11, then he fell asleep.

At the end of an hour he started up in bed, having heard a sound like the opening of a door. A strange, shuddering sensation ran through his limbs as he stared fixedly into the room and beheld a white form moving toward the bed.

Terror overpowered him, but the next instant he regained his coolness, and shouted in a firm voice, "Who's there?"

No answer, but the shape remained standing in the middle of the floor.

"Who's there?" Answer, or as sure as I live I'll fire," he called again, cocking his pistol.

He was once more the quiet, cold-blooded physician. He had surely heard the creaking of a door, it must be a man; a rascal, a murderer, perhaps, but no spectre.

Yet, spite of the pistol's warning snap, the figure did not move.

The physician stretched out his arm and fired.

A flash of light illumined the dusky chamber and the report shook the old tapestry. Scarcely had the sound died away when a burst of discordant, jeering, feudish laughter greeted him, and something hard struck his forehead. It was the bullet.

Seized with terrible dread he fired the other pistol at the motionless white form—again the frightful laughter echoed through the room and the bullet fell heavily back on his own breast.

With a loud shriek he sank down on the bed.

The form glided noiselessly out of the door.

Early next morning, while Anna was watering her flowers, Victor came up to her.

"Where is your brother?" she asked.

"He isn't up yet, poor fellow. He has had a terrible fright."

"What was it?"

"If you'll promise to keep silent I'll tell the whole story. To revenge myself on him I played ghost, first taking care to draw the bullets from his pistols that he might not use the weapons recklessly. Wrapped in sheets I visited him and threw the balls back at his head when he fired."

"Nothing could be better!" exclaimed Anna. "But promise me not to speak of it. Your mother must not be vexed and he himself must not be undecieved." "Trust me; I'll be as mute as the grave." The physician did not come; breakfast waited in vain. At last some of the gentlemen went to wake him. He lay with his head stretched over the edge of the bed; his mouth wide open, his eyes were starting from their sockets and his hair was as white as chalk. Life had vanished. His discharged pistols were found by his side. One week later Victor was taken to the asylum.

NOTES.

To a stranger to our system of government it must seem like our principal occupation is running for office.

Music and poetry may be the food of love—but they are not a very substantial or invigorating diet. Corned beef and pork and beans go much further toward the main stay of life.

We all like to see a young girl rosy and fresh as the morning dew. But when a girl is fresh we condemn her at once. It is the modern idea of "freshness", that detracts from her merit.

A member of the Illinois Legislature had great difficulty in proving that he was not an ex-convict. Some of our legislators at the end of the session might find greater difficulty in establishing the fact that they ought not to be convicts.

A lady was asked her age, and replied thus: "My age, if multiplied by three, Two-sevenths of that product would tripled be, The square root of two-ninths of that is four, Now tell my age or never see me more."

The Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives at Washington, is engaged in the investigation of some of the Southern States for the infraction of the 14th amendment. It does not require a congressional investigation to disclose the fact that in many of the Southern States a total disregard of the rights of citizens has been indulged for many years.

"William, will you remain home to-night and mind the baby? I want to go to a lecture with Mrs. Gadder." "With the greatest of pleasure, my dear. By the way, I noticed that the new maid you engaged this morning is decidedly good looking, and—" "William, I was only joking about going to the lecture. I shall remain at home and mind the baby myself. I couldn't trust him with you."

Women's clubs are common enough in New York, but a novelty among them is the Matinee Club, which was recently organized by a dozen young ladies of "the literary set." Twice a month the members of the Club attend some theatrical matinee, selected by a vote, and the following week meet at the house of one of the members and devote the afternoon to a discussion of the performance which they saw the week before.

The Legislature is making a poor record for the Republican party. The Record-Union proclaims the truth when it says the non-passage of a ballot reform bill will sound the death knell of the Republican party in this State. The American people are becoming more and more independent at each election and the party lash and the bosses' powers are growing beautifully less when not used in the interest of the masses.

The bar service is almost invariably by women—in London and the larger towns by young, sprightly and generally beautiful girls; in the country and in the poorer quarters of the city by the proprietor's wife and daughters. Good ale is "three-hapence" (three cents) a large glass; a "small go of cold Scotch" is tuppence or thruppence, and the largest "go" or the most expensive liquor is sixpence in all but the finest places. The spirit is invariably measured out and is of high proof; if it is diluted, notice to that effect is conspicuously posted, as the law requires. My estimate is that, taking a general average, two Englishmen drink as much as three American men, and as all or nearly all the women drink, the traffic is enormous. I have not traveled any road yet that did not average a "public" for every two miles, exclusive of the larger villages. And finally, the revenue from liquor is just now rapidly increasing, from which economists argue that the laboring classes are prosperous.

We never knew what is denominated a "sure thing" gambler, that ever acquired a competency for living. Indeed, in a great majority of cases the crooked gentry end up in prison, or the gutter. We have known many "thimble rig," and "bunko" sharps, who have obtained, through their trickery, thousands of dollars, but by some inscrutable providential action, this money always slips from them. It seems fated that the money obtained in this manner, goes as it comes. The most notorious and successful sharps end their career penitentiaries, vagrants, or in prison. There are gamblers who have acquired fortunes, but this class of gamblers have no relation to the "sure thing" crook, or "three card monte" class. There are gamblers who are above any deception or cheating, and it is this class that often acquires wealth. While the old school gambler is extinct, yet there are honorable men engaged in this business, and some of the most distinguished men of the nation are inveterate poker players.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Ole Olson will be the attraction at the Metropolitan on Monday and Tuesday nights. The play and company are new to a Sacramento audience. It is said to be an interesting sketch, and a good dialect company.

Carmen was given last night by the bright little artist, Corinne. She is destined to be the leading burlesque star in the dramatic circle. Her manners and actions are genuine American, and original, except possibly the costumes. To-night Monte Christo, Jr., will be presented for the first time in this city. The company is good, far above the ordinary support.

The Bald Head Row.
A SOUBRETTE SONG.

As I go walking down the street,
And note the many things I meet,
I see sometimes upon the bills,
A grande ballet with gauze and frills,
And I think of the bald head row.

Whenever there occurs a chance,
To see some sprightly kicker dance,
No matter where that chance may be,
You are always sure to see,
Chairs all taken in the bald head row.

And when the music plays,
How memories of other days,
Come from the distant past,
And now, with then, contrast,
Down in the bald head row.

The dear, old, jolly boys,
They never make much noise,
But, oh! how hard they try,
To be giddy on the sly,
Down in the bald head row.

How bright their pates do shine,
And their faces—how benign—
Be the dancing slow or quick,
You bet! they never miss a trick,
Down in the bald head row.

The old rascals won't go away,
But will sit the entire play,
Trying hard a glance to win,
Fogetting that their hair's so thin,
Down in the bald head row.

You younger swells may laugh,
When I give the old boys chaff,
But if you only have your way,
You will all get there some day—
Down in the bald head row.

—John Audley.

We have been permitted to read a new lay, the result of the joint work of J. D. Moynahan and Wm. Halley, the latter giving the stage and acting portion of the drama. The title of this drama has not yet been fully determined. The plot is excellent, and well adapted for strong stage effects, and the work is of much literary merit. Some changes have been suggested in the tone of action, which will be adopted before the play is placed on the boards. The leading characters are remarkably strong. "Shaun McGouns," a bright mind temporarily deranged by an accident, furnishes scope for splendid art work on the stage. "Gerald Grafton," the character around which the play revolves, is one which in the hands of an accomplished actor cannot fail. "Nora O'Hanlon" is a beautiful character, wherein lies great emotional and dramatic power. "Ralph Thoruton," the villain of the plot, has many strong situations. His soliloquy, and the fears and promptings of a guilty conscience upon the murder of Gerald's father, just at the time he had found the hidden treasure in the old Abbey, has great dramatic effect, and is very good as a literary production as well. The drama is enlivened by the introduction of an American, with all the characteristics of our country. The other dramatis personæ have important characters to personate. The scene of the drama is laid in Ireland, and is founded on an old tradition of the year 1650, wherein the great-grandfather of Gerald had buried a large amount of money in an old abbey, to be revealed under certain contingencies, which had arrived at the time of this drama, in 1850. While "Harold Grafton," the father of "Gerald," was in the act of unearthing the treasure he was murdered by "Ralph Thornton," and the treasure appropriated. After this "Ralph" tries to woo the beautiful "Nora," the betrothed of "Gerald." From this on the plot grows deeply interesting, and abounds with startling developments. "Shaun" becomes a leading character, and unravels the mysteries by regaining his reason. The authors of the drama will name the play and put it on the stage at an early date.

The press upon which THEMIS was printed to-day, is run by an electric motor, one of the first introduced in Sacramento. Electricity not only furnishes us light, flashes our telegrams, run our street railways, but will soon furnish all our power in manufactures, and at no distant day will displace the locomotive. Edison, the electrician, is undoubtedly the greatest genius that has ever lived.

Mrs. Jud C. Brusie Injured.

The injury of Mrs. Jud C. Brusie in the recent railroad accident in Indiana, caused the friends of the family much pain and anxiety. The lady is not so dangerously injured as at first reported. Mr. Brusie left for the East on Thursday night to attend his wife.

We call the attention of our readers to the quality of paper and ink used in the publication of THEMIS, also to the style of type used, the general make up and superior press work. No paper on the coast can present advertisements more attractively than this paper. We point with pride in this issue to the advertisements of Wein-stock, Labin & Co. and Scott & Gilbert.

"I do not advertise. I simply mark my goods in the window." That is what a K street shop-keeper said to an advertising man a few days since. Shortly afterwards he had a lot of very pretty handkerchiefs which he wished to dispose of, and hung some of them out with the tempting inscription, "Selling at half price." The advertiser's wife happened to pass by and inquired the price of the goods in question. "Fifty cents each, madam." "I'll take a dozen of them," answered the lady, and the handkerchiefs were wrapped up. She took them and depositing three dollars on the counter was walking away when the merchant said: "Excuse me, madam, but the price of the dozen handkerchiefs you have got is six dollars." "I am well aware of that," said the advertiser's wife, "but the half price of them is only three dollars. The half price sign has been taken down and the merchant now pays for printer's ink."

A funny incident occurred at a choir rehearsal in one of the fashionable churches not long ago. They were preparing for the following Sunday morning a beautiful selection, the first words of which were, "I am a Pilgrim." It so happened that the music divided the word pilgrim, and made a pause after the first syllable. The effect was most amusing. The Soprano sang in a high key, "I am a Pil—," and stopped. The alto repeated, "I am a Pil—." The tenor acknowledged he was a "Pil—," and when the bass came thundering in with the like declaration, "I am a Pil—," it was too much for the gravity of the singers, and they roared. No amount of practice could get them past the fatal pause without an outburst, and the piece had to be given up.

ELECTION NOTICE.

THERE WILL BE AN ELECTION IN THIS CITY
TUESDAY, MARCH 10, 1891,

When the following City Officers are to be elected, viz:
THIRD TRUSTEE.
CITY AUDITOR.
CITY ASSESSOR.
CITY COLLECTOR.
FIRE COMMISSIONER—FULL TERM.
FIRE COMMISSIONER—SHORT TERM.

Whereas, the city of Sacramento, by authority of the Board of Police Commissioners of said city, a body duly established by law and invested with the power to appoint and elect members of the police force of said city under authority of an Act of the Legislature of the State of California, entitled "An Act to amend an Act amendatory of and supplementary to an Act approved March 25, 1863, entitled an Act to incorporate the city of Sacramento," approved March 14, 1889, created and incurred an indebtedness by the employment of a number of policemen in excess of the number authorized by the said amended Act of the Legislature of 1863; and

Whereas, The Legislature of 1891 passed an Act which was duly approved on the 20th day of February, 1891, providing for the submission to a vote of the people the proposition of levying a Special Tax to pay any indebtedness incurred by municipal corporations during the years 1889 and 1890; therefore be it

Resolved, by the Board of Trustees of the city of Sacramento, that the question of raising the sum of $18,000 by the levy of a special tax for the purpose of paying the indebtedness created and incurred as aforesaid, be submitted to a vote of the qualified electors of said city of Sacramento at the municipal election to be held in said city on the 10th day of March, 1891.

Resolved, That following the names of the candidates of the respective political parties on the tickets printed and to be voted at said municipal election, the following words shall be printed: "For the special tax—yes." Electors desiring to vote in favor of said proposed special tax shall vote as follows: "For the special tax—yes," and those desiring to vote against said proposed special tax, shall erase or scratch with ink or a pencil the word, "Yes," and substitute therefor and write in the same manner opposite said words, "For the special tax" the word "No."

Resolved, That the words "For the special tax—yes" shall be printed upon said tickets or ballots, and the votes upon said proposition shall be counted in the manner prescribed by the laws of the State of California, relating to the printing and counting of election ballots.

The election will be conducted according to the General Election Law, excepting the election returns must be made to the Clerk of the Board of City Trustees.

The qualification of voters is that their names are on the Great Register of Sacramento county. The polls will open at sunrise and close at 5 o'clock P. M.

The last congressional reports furnish some thrilling reading. "You're a liar," "Damn the Speaker," and such gentle remarks are conspicuous.

A poor devil was convicted because he played with five queens in the deck. England should be prosecuted, because she has had five queens in the game of government.

The other evening, while a husband was reading his daily paper, his wife caught sight of the picture of William III. Wife—Whose picture is that? Husband—That is the picture of William III; he is dead. Wife—It seems to me that all of the foreign nobles are dying of late. Husband—Well, they are all getting old. Queen Victoria is liable to go soon. What a wail will go up when she dies. Wife—Yes, the Prince of Wales will go up.

Expensive Hunting Trip.

"I was arrested once by the Sheriff of Placer county in Auburn," said Frank Ruhstaller a few days ago to a party of friends. "I'll tell you how it happened. Fred Knauer, Julius Damith, myself and two other parties went up to Volcanoville on a hunting expedition. It is one of the finest game sections in El Dorado county. We had a fine rig, a good hunting outfit and plenty of provisions and ammunition. It was very late in the season, however, and the night we reached the camping ground a foot of snow fell, necessitating our immediate return. The next night we stopped at a miner's cabin. He was not home. The door was fastened with a padlock and chain, but we pulled the staple and took possession of the cabin. We soon had a crackling fire in the chimney, brought in our blankets and soon were very comfortable. We cared for our horses in the woodshed. The next morning we wrote a note to the proprietor and left him a package of coffee, boulogne sausage, a box of cigars, jug of whisky, three or four bottles of wine, in fact, nearly all we took with us, in compensation for our night's lodging. Shortly after we left, another lot of hunters came along, took our note and everything we had left, some things belonging to the miner, and skipped. About five o'clock we reached Auburn. We drove in the yard of the court-house and asked to be directed to the brewery.

"It was the Sheriff we were addressing. After giving us the desired information, he asked if we had not come down from Georgetown, and if Frank Ruhstaller and Fred Knauer were of the party. When he received his reply in the affirmative, he drew from his pocket a piece of paper, remarking: 'Gentlemen, I am very sorry, but here is a warrant for your arrest on a charge of housebreaking and burglary.'

"We explained as best we could, and soon secured bail. It cost us $29.75 for telegraphing, $75 more to square the thing, and we had to buy as much more wine and beer for our friends in Auburn, who regarded it as a big joke. It was the most expensive hunting trip I ever took. All the game we bagged was a red-headed woodpecker and a lonely bluejay."

Good-Bye.

A friend of THEMIS thus discourses on "good-bye," a simple phrase, so common and yet so full of solemn and tender meaning: "How many emotions cluster around that word. How full of sadness, and to us how full of sorrow it sounds. It is with us a consecrated word. We heard it once within the year, as we hope never to hear it again. We spoke it on an occasion such as we hope never to speak it again. It was in the chamber of death, at the still hour of night's noon. The curtains were all closed, the lights were shaded, and we stood in the dim solemn twilight with others around the bed of the dying. The damps of death were on her pale young brow, and coldness was on her lips, as we kissed her for the last time while living. "Good-bye, my daughter," we whispered. We know not if she ever spoke more, but "good-bye" was the last ever heard of her sweet voice. We hear that last sorrowful word often and often as we sit alone busy with the memories of the past. We hear it in the silence of night, in the hours of nervous wakefulness, as we lay upon our bed thinking of the loved and lost to us. We hear it in our dreams, when her sweet face comes back to us as it was in its loveliness and beauty. We hear it when we sit beside her grave in the cemetery where she sleeps alone, with no kindred as yet by her side. She was the hope of our life, the prop upon which to lean when age should come upon us and life should be running to its dregs. The hope and the prop are gone, and we care not how soon we go down to sleep beside our darling, beneath the shadow of the weeping willow in the city of the dead."

A Girl I Used to Know.

Yes, it's a form I used to know, a face I used to see,

That rises as it were from death and looks again at me;

The smooth, soft curls of chestnut hair, the forehead white and low,

The sad and tender hazel eyes of a girl I used to know.

Day after day, night after night, I set the plans on 'Change

Which make the destinies of men, and will you think it strange

That gains were never yet so high, nor fortune yet so low,

That midnight fancy summoned not a girl I used to know?

I kissed her once, so long ago, beneath the soft moonlight;

The shadows flickered o'er her dress and flecked its folds of white,

The maple branches overhead swayed softly to and fro

In gentle cadence, like the voice of a girl I used to know.

The old, old story of two hearts, one fonder far than true;

And hers alone, and innocent, to trust and bear the rue,

And mine to keep forever more, her image haunts me so,

The wistful, white, imploring face of the girl I used to know.

I see a slender churchyard cross, with words of faith engraved,

I wonder if in heaven's courts her blighted life is saved.

I stifle with the incense of the lilies white that blow

Above the narrow, lonely grave of the girl I used to know.

Mrs. Potts—What time was it when you got home last night? Mr. Potts—Really, I don't know, my dear. I was so abashed by getting in late that I could not look the clock in the face.

The husband or wife deprived of the companionship of a lifetime, sees the children going forth from the parental roof to homes of their own, and realizes that in a little while there will be only a forsaken hearthstone and all the chairs vacant save one. It is not surprising that the heart goes out in quest of a companionship that will remain steadfast, rather than to endure the isolation of age. If people of mature years make a sensible marriage and are governed in their selection by a due regard for the interests of their children, it is not a subject that calls for jest or censure. If thereby they find a grateful peace and a welcome comradeship in their declining years, this should be a matter of pleasure to their relatives and friends, who should feel no right to criticize or interfere.

A story is told of a funny incident in a suburban school. A new pupil came for whom there was no desk. The bright-eyed, golden-haired teacher told the boy "to sit on the front seat for the present." He was given some attention during the day, but when school was dismissed still clung to the seat. "Well, Johnny," said the teacher, "are you not going home?" "Yes, ma'am," the boy replied, "but I'm waitin' for the present. I want to take it home." The teacher laughed, but attempted an explanation, and Johnny walked sadly out, realizing that life is full of delusive hopes, and that "things are not what they seem."

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California.—In the matter of the estates and guardianship of Mary F. and Walter J. Hennessy, minors. Elizabeth Hennessy, the guardian of the estates of Mary F. Hennessy and Walter J. Hennessy, minors, having filed her petition herein, duly verified, praying for an order of sale of the real estate of said decedent, for the purposes therein set forth, it is therefore ordered by the said Court that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased appear before the said Superior Court on the 6th day of March, 1891, at 10 o'clock A. M. of said day, at the Court-room of said Superior Court, at County of Sacramento, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said guardian to sell so much of the real estate of the said minors as shall be necessary. And that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for three successive weeks in THEMIS, a newspaper printed and published in said county. W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge of the Superior Court.

Dated February 4th, 1891.

C. T. JONES & MATT. F. JOHNSON,
[se7-4t] Attorneys for Petitioner.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California.—In the matter of Warren Starr, an insolvent debtor.—Warren Starr, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, from which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said Warren Starr is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said Warren Starr, insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent to him, or to any person, firm, corporation or association for his use; and the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Hon. A. P. Catlin, Judge of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court-room of said Court, in the County of Sacramento, on the 13th day of March 1891, at 10 o'clock A. M. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered, that the order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation, published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published, before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And it is further ordered, that, in the meantime, all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated February 4th, 1891.

W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge of the Superior Court.

W. A. ANDERSON, Attorney for insolvent.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to DAVID KIZER, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 29th day of January, 1891, in which action, Annie Kizer is plaintiff, and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of said Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between plaintiff and defendant on the grounds of desertion and failure to provide; also, for the care, custody and control of the minor children, the issue of said marriage, viz: Nettie and Edna, aged 5 years, and 15 months respectively, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made; and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court, this 29th day of January A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.

By J. F. Doody, Deputy Clerk.

W. A. GETT, JR., Attorney for Plaintiff. ja31-9t

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—In the Superior Court.—In the matter of the petition of W. C. Hays, an insolvent debtor. Upon reading and filing the petition, schedule and inventory of W. C. Hays, the above named petitioner, and on motion of L. S. Taylor, his attorney, it is ordered and declared that said petitioner is insolvent. And it is ordered that the Sheriff of the County of Sacramento do take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of said insolvent debtor (except such as may be, by law exempt from execution), and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee. And all persons are forbidden to pay any debts to said debtor, or to deliver any property belonging to such debtor to him, or to any one for his use, and said debtor is forbidden to transfer any property to any one except said Sheriff. And it is further ordered that a meeting of all creditors of said debtor be held on Monday, the 9th day of March, 1891, at 10 o'clock A. M., at the court room of the Superior Court aforesaid, in the court house, in the City of Sacramento, to prove their debts, and choose one or more assignees of the estate; and that a copy of this order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation, as often as said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And all proceedings against the said insolvent are hereby stayed. Sacramento, January 23, 1891. A. P. CATLIN, Judge of the Superior Court.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of Harry Dewey, an insolvent debtor.—Harry Dewey, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said Harry Dewey is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court-room of said Court, on the 13th day of March, 1891, at 10 o'clock A. M., of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

PHILIP S. DRIVER, Attorney for Insolvent. se7-5t

The reason why Napoleon I adopted the golden bees as an imperial emblem is not generally known and to this day many believe that it was done merely with a view of snuffing out the old royal badge—the fleur-de-lis. This, however, is not the case. In the days of Louis XIV the tomb of Childeric was opened and beside his remains were found the skeletons of his horse and his page, his drinking cup and about 200 little medals in gold and cornelian, engraved with bees. A courtier told his Majesty Le Roi "Soleil" that the bees were undoubtedly royal emblems of far greater antiquity than the fleur-de-lis; but Louis, who was no fool, refused to adopt this idea and to discard the fleur-de-lis in favor of the golden bees. When Napoleon was crowned Emperor he jumped at a similar suggestion and smothered his shields, his banners and his robes with the little insect which seemed to fly over all the battlefields of Europe. Some years later a cynical old antiquary informed the Emperor, however, that the medals found in Childeric's tomb were simply the scales of the armor of the great King's favorite charger which had been buried with him. Napoleon was at first much incensed, but at last, turning upon the informer, he said bluntly, "Cela ne change rien à l'affaire, de par moi l'abeille est devenue impériale en volant à la victoire!"

WOMEN AND MICE.

The reason why a woman is afraid of a mouse is a profound mystery—indeed, it has never been very clearly proven that she is. But some women are constantly in such a nervous, irritable condition that the slightest thing annoys and startles them. The cause of this unfortunate state of affairs is usually some functional derangement; some distressing or painful irregularity, some derangement or peculiar weakness incident to her sex; or, it may be due to inflammation, ulceration or displacement, of some of the pelvic viscera, or to other organic lesions peculiar to her sex. From whichever cause it may arise, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a positive remedy, so certain in its curative results that its manufacturers sell it, through druggists, under a guarantee of its giving satisfaction in every case, or money paid for it will be promptly refunded. As a soothing and strengthening nerve, "Favorite Prescription" is unequalled and is invaluable in allaying and subduing nervous excitability, irritability, exhaustion, prostration, hysteria, spasms and other distressing, nervous symptoms commonly attendant upon functional and organic disease of the womb. It induces refreshing sleep and relieves mental anxiety and despondency.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
J. H. MILLER, Managing Editor.

An attorney-at-law, Carpenter by name, having advised and counseled his client to disobey an injunction of the Superior Court of this county, issued by Judge Catlin's predecessor, was tried for the offense and found guilty, the proof being adduced from his own written orders to his client. The most flagrant case of willful contempt of the injunction was established, and for this the attorney was fined $200. or imprisonment 200 days. Now, this libel on the honored profession of the law has invoked the Assembly to present articles of impeachment to the Senate of California against the honorable Judge, who did only his duty, and who tempered his judgment with mercy, for the most grievous infraction of the law. In place of articles of impeachment against the learned and conscientious Judge, this disgruntled lawyer, Carpenter, should be disbarred, in addition to receiving the severest penalty of the law, for his gross contempt. From the showing made to the Assembly, wherein articles are invoked, it appears that there is no basis for impeachment, and we trust, for the sake of the good name of our community, that the Assembly will ignore the bill, and defeat this vile attempt to smirch an honored name. If every violator of the law, orders and judgments of Courts should be granted this privilege, there would be no end to the attacks on our honored judiciary. We know the facts of the case wherein Carpenter was adjudged guilty of contempt; and there never was a clearer case. Judge Catlin was merciful to this ingrate, whereupon he proceeds to ask the Assembly to blacken his name by perfering articles of impeachment. A trial upon impeachment would disclose what we have said, and show Hon. A. P. Catlin to be a learned, upright and merciful Judge, and that his defamer should be driven from the honorable profession he now disgraces. For the credit of the Sacramento bar, we are glad that this fellow Carpenter is not one of us, but is a quasi member of the Stockton bar. His brother attorneys of that city say of him that he has just enough legal knowledge to get a client into trouble, but not enough to get him out.

When any author or writer prates about his originality, and that his is the only Simon-pure article, we brand him at once as a veritable plagiarist. Emerson has it right when he says, "What is a great man but one of the great affinities, who takes up unto himself all arts, sciences, all knowables, as his food? Every book is a quotation; and every house is a quotation of all forests and mines and stone quarries; and every man is a quotation from all his ancestors." There is no writer, orator or author who does not utilize the ideas and thoughts of others. They are often dressed in a new and different garb, arranged in accord with the notions and ideas of the one who appropriates the same. No one has a lien on thoughts; if there was such a thing, many of our distinguished modern authors would have to respond for encroachments on the rights of property of our ancient literary men. When we consider that there is rarely anything new in literature, certainly it is no misappropriation to deck out old thoughts in new and attractive garbs. A favorite chef can make numerous palatable dishes for the high liver out of the most commonplace articles of food. So the adroit writer can dress up an old thought so that it will tickle the palate of those given to literature. The 30,000 publications annually are but the redress of old stories, old thoughts—some, thousands of years old. Such are the foibles of the present generation that if a brilliant, original thought emanates from some poor, obscure Bohemian, little attention is given it, while if an old thought is clothed in dazzling raiment by some antiquated fossil of literature, it is at once immortalized. The shiftless public never thinks to look in some old book of two or three thousands years ago, where the original thought can be found. He is the brightest genius who can best adapt old thoughts to modern taste. Some are so dull and clumsy that they rather detract from the brilliancy of the original idea, by casting around it the stupidity of the present. Nine-tenths of the alleged humor of paragraphers are but weak imitations. Much of the higher order of literature is but a readaptation. There is, indeed, little new.

Now we have a demand made against the United States, by the heirs of Barrundia, for one million dollars, based on the killing of that murderous revolutionist by the officers of the law, while he was attempting to murder them. This is the outcome of a very greatly misunderstood affair. In this connection we call attention to the brilliant defense of Minister Mizner, by Hon. Joseph McKenna, on the 8th day of last month, on the floor of Congress. Our modest, yet able representative, had been goaded to such an extent that he was forced to strike back, even over the shoulders of the Department of State. It was shown that all precedents were in support of Mizner's action. The very recent order of Secretary Bayard was directly in point, and this was in unison with the decisions of the Federal Supreme Court, and with all international law writers, including the line of action by the heads of the Department of State for many years. The circumstances connected with this Barrundia affair were such, however, that Secretary Blaine felt called upon to recall Mizner, and possibly the rule in such diplomatic matters had been changed through the agency of the Pan American Conference. Under Article XVII of the Uniform Treaties, adopted July, 1890, there seems to have been a fixed rule agreed upon that a political offender, seeking shelter at a legation, shall be granted an asylum and not surrendered at the demand of the government to which he is accredited. The difficulty in which the government now finds itself is, that by necessary implication Minister Mizner's recall gives a semblance to the demand for damages for the killing of this vulgar outlaw, who was execrated by his own government. This nation may, however, escape this claim on the ground that the country to which Barrundia is accredited will not make any claim, and that the heirs or individuals are precluded from asserting any claim. When this affair was first announced, we published a carefully prepared article sustaining the Minister's action, and time has developed that what we then said was the law of the case.

Political partisanship, within the past few years, has not been that patriotic devotion to the country and the public welfare which prompted the action of our fathers. In all parties there exists a selfish and personal desire. A desire to foist friends and those who can aid the party exercising power in selfish purposes. Competency and good government have been but secondary considerations. This applies to each of the great national parties. The assumed leaders are actuated through personal motives, at all times disregarding the true purposes of government. The Republican party, when aroused to the exigencies of the situation, can always be relied on for good government and advanced ideas on national, state and municipal progress. It is only when apathy exists and irresponsible creatures secure the working machinery of the party politics, that it drifts into bad repute. As a matter of history the Democratic party is continuously in the hands of those who use it for personal and sectional interests. This is rarely true of the Republicans, except in municipal affairs. There is now a fair prospect that the grand old party in all its branches—national, state and local—will be cleansed of this impure element, and that at the next national contest will present a solid and unbroken front. The "Alliances" and other off-shoots from the party will serve to purify the party and force it to exclude the selfish and mercenary elements. Our local political contest which will occur next Tuesday is evidence of this new state of affairs. The candidates are the representatives of the best element in the party, as well as the first order of citizenship. There may be those who are yet smarting under the lash of "bossism," and who may still seek to visit these sins of commission on the party, yet there is no just cause for the same. No cause exists why all who are in favor of good government should not prove their party fealty by supporting the entire Republican ticket.

Much is being said about the useless positions of City Justices. It is true that those two officials do little toward earning their salaries, and that they have been an unjust burden on the city. The Township Justice is the direct cause for lack of business for the City Justices. We desire to call attention to the fact that there is no necessity for any legislation to dispose of the Township Justice. That functionary is the mere creature of the Board of Supervisors. For some inscrutable cause, the Board of Supervisors, under the County Government Act of 1883, created the office of Township Justice. We say created, but with a reservation, in this, that it is by no means absolutely clear that there exists such an office. When the county was reorganized by political subdivisions, it seems that the municipality of Sacramento city was called a township, but without any township government. Under the County Government Act such a township could, at the pleasure of the Supervisors, have a Township Justice. This, however, was intended to apply to townships which included more territory than is comprised in the city. That is to say, where the city does not comprise the entire township. Now, to set matters at rest, the Board of Supervisors can at any time dispense with the so-called Township Justice.

Shannahan, of Shasta, is after the Munchausen family, especially that portion of the relatives of the ancient and unlamented liar who belong to the newspaper profession. Now, Shannahan is standing on very thin ice. He is the "tall sycamore" from Mount Shasta, yet he lives in a glass house and is throwing stones. He is a lawyer, belongs to a profession which sells itself to make people believe that black is white—a profession of professional liars. The Marysville Appeal discourses upon the merits of his bill "thusly:" "The bill to prevent lying about newspaper circulation should be put through the Legislature without further delay. And, if not too late, bills should be passed to punish all other kinds of lying to which the wicked world is addicted. Advertisers should be punished for lying, as much is the newspaper publishers who lie about circulation. It may not be possible to punish circus and dramatic agents for lying, but at least they can be required to take out a license to pursue their mendacious calling. The legislators themselves should be made to pay heavy fines for lying to their constituents, or for making promises before election which are afterwards broken. There is a vast amount of social lying going on at all times, and this also should be prohibited by law. As it is well known that an Act of the Legislature may have a powerful effect upon the morals of the people, the need of anti-lying laws is plain."

Mr. Gladstone, a few days since, made a long speech in the House of Commons, and then remained until the adjournment at 2 o'clock in the morning. He is in deed a wonderful man. Men remain longer in public life in England than they do in this country. A statesman of sixty-five or seventy is there considered in his prime.

From all indications, the scandal which we predicted some weeks ago, regarding the election of a successor of Senator Hearst, is about to be realized. We hoped that Senator Hearst might survive to spare us these scenes. But fate has decreed otherwise, and we are now in the midst of an unholy scramble for that which should be the greatest ambition of an American statesman. It is openly proclaimed that true merit and ability are not the qualities that shall succeed. The bright mind, the exalted citizen, the man gifted in statecraft must stand aside, unless perchance he can satisfy the demands of the conscienceless Warwicks, who claim to hold the dominion of such affairs. When we consider that the brilliant and able minds are generally attached to poverty-stricken bodies, there is little chance for them in this struggle. We hope that better things may occur, and that merit may be taken into account in selecting California's junior representative in the United States Senate—it is a hope only.

This is our last issue before the municipal election. We call upon our citizens to support the Republican ticket. It is clean; the men are able and tried citizens. They are pledged to good government—to reform in police affairs—and above all to a resistance to the unlawful demand of 55 per cent. of the gross water rents. This last obligation should insure their election.

THE PROPERTY OF THE PIONEERS.

The Sons and Daughters to Succeed, in Time, to Its Control—A Liberal and Wise Action.

At a meeting of the Sacramento Society of California Pioneers held at their hall in this city, February 28, 1891, the following report from a committee appointed for that purpose was presented, accepted and read:

To the Sacramento Society of California Pioneers: Our Society is so constituted that in course of time it may become extinct. When the time will come that our Society will wish to surrender its property to a successor, cannot now be exactly foreseen. In the opinion of your committee it should keep all its property in its own hands until the number of its members shall be less than thirteen, and that thereafter every member should be allowed certain privileges at the hall, which shall be equivalent to its continuance as the headquarters of our members as long as any shall live. After our Society shall cease to act as such, its property should go into the hands of some person or corporation charged with its care and with the care of the graves of those who have died or shall die members.

Three plans have been suggested to accomplish this purpose, and referred to your committee:

1st. That the city of Sacramento be made successor to our Society, charged with the care of our cemetery plot.

2d. That all the male descendants of the members of the Society, if found worthy, be elected sub-members of this association, such sub-members to have all the rights and privileges to assemble and take part in all social meetings of this Society, in the same manner as if they were original pioneers, saving and excepting that they shall have no vote in the government of the Society until the number of the members of this corporation shall be reduced to five, when the sub-members shall become full members of the corporation.

3d. That a corporation be formed of the lineal descendants of members of this Society, to which, at the proper time, all our property interests shall be transferred, charged with its management and the proper care of the cemetery plot of our Society.

Your committee is in receipt of a petition signed by twenty-seven sons of our members, referring to the object of this committee, respectfully submitting that the end in view could in no way be better subserved than by allowing our sons to become our successors, as they would be more likely to perform the duties devolving on them than strangers, and offering to incorporate under a suitable name and to honor our memory by a faithful discharge of their obligation imposed by their agreements and filial affection.

We are also in receipt of a petition from twenty-nine of the daughters of our members, relating to the same subject matter, representing that they are as much interested in the subject matter as are their brothers, and they trust that our members are as much interested in the welfare of our daughters as of our sons. That in the matter of devotion and caring for the graves of their fathers, they are and will be as attentive to their duties as their brothers would be.

They therefore ask that in the disposition we may make of the property of our corporation, it will require that our daughters shall share the responsibilities and benefits equally with our sons. They assure us that they will not be behind their brothers in any act of diligence or affection for our memory, or in the care of our graves.

Your committee do not favor the first proposition above stated, even if the city had the power to act as trustee in the matter. The second proposition, made by Brother Powers, is worthy of consideration, and it might be adopted without yielding any of our privileges until the proper time had come. But your committee are of the opinion that any attempt to make our sons members of our Society would give less satisfaction to us and to our children, than to constitute our successor a separate organization, giving them certain privileges which would allow us the benefit of their society at times, but allowing each to control their separate organization.

Your committee, therefore, express their decided convictions, that the third proposition is the most feasible, and is better calculated to meet the views of all parties. We see no reason why our sons should become our successors to the exclusion of our daughters. On the contrary, every reason seems to us to favor giving our children equal privileges. Our whole civil system is based on the idea that our daughters succeed to our property the same as our sons. Our daughters are equally affectionate, self-sacrificing and devoted to our memory; and to require that our sons and daughters shall have equal rights as our succession, will tend to keep the recollection of our early life in California fresh in the minds of our children, and thus we may best perpetuate the "Sacramento Society of California Pioneers."

We recommend the passage of the following resolutions:

I. That the sons and daughters of this Society be, and they are hereby invited to form themselves into a corporation, with a suitable constitution and by-laws, with objects similar to our own.

II. That every son and daughter of a member of this Society of good character, or of one who died a member of this Society in good standing, and every lineal descendant of such sons and daughters, of good moral character, should be entitled to membership in such new corporation.

III. That such new corporation be allowed, without charge, to hold their meetings in our hall, at times to be assigned by our Board of Directors.

IV. That at sometime hereafter, to be fixed by us, this Society shall convey to such new corporation, all property then remaining, real, personal and mixed, on the sole trust and consideration that the said property shall remain in a corporation, with the lineal descendants of our members as the corporation, and that such corporation shall at all times preserve, care for, and keep in good order, the cemetery plot of our Society.

ALBERT LEONARD.

On motion of E. D. Shirland, the foregoing report, including the resolutions therein contained and recommended, were unanimously adopted. And it was further resolved, "that the President of this Association call a meeting of those entitled to become corporators under the said report, and preside at such meeting until the same shall be fully organized; that he then present a copy of the said report and of these resolutions to said meeting for its further action."

How Nye Stopped the Bad Boys.

Bill Nye told a story just before going home. "Once," said he, "I had the misfortune to live in the same block with a Congressman. In that neighborhood there were a number of little boys who had the habit of ringing door bells and then going away. After we had put up with this for quite a while, the Congressman and I held a convention. And we resolved that we would put an end to this ringing of bells if we had to throw the boy who did it any distance—twenty miles, and we would bring the boy back and embalm him. Well, one night shortly after this conversation there was a strong pull at the bell. I suspected what it was, and dashed out just as I was. It was very dark. I could hear the boy running away, however, and pursued the footsteps. When I had run about half a block I thought it would be a good plan to turn and go the other way, and catch the boy in front. So I turned and ran around to the other side of the block.

Pretty soon I could hear the boy coming the other way, panting through the darkness. I paused, and opened my arms wide to embrace him as he came on. I succeeded. Then I delivered a powerful blow into the bosom of the night. Well, we clinched and rolled over each other on the ground, and gouged and thumped at each other till the welkin rang. At least, I think it did; I am sure that mine did. Then we decided that we had had enough, and that we ought to call it a draw. So I withdrew my nose from his mouth and rose. He rose, also, and we stood facing each other. We gradually recovered our breath. His came first. It seemed to be nearer and more easily reached. When he finally spoke, I heard the Congressman say: "There, I'll teach you to ring my door bell again!" —N. Y. Sun.

Gold Discovery.

Regarding the discovery of gold, General Sherman once wrote of his experience at San Diego, Cal.: "I remember one day, in the spring of 1848, that two men, Americans, came into the office and inquired for the Governor. I asked their business and one answered that they had just come down from Captain Sutter on special business, and they wanted to see Governor Mason in person. I took them in to the colonel and left them together. After some time the colonel came to the door and called to me. I went in, and my attention was directed to a series of papers unfolded on his table, in which lay about half an ounce of placer gold. Mason said to me, 'What is that?' I touched it and examined one or two of the larger pieces and asked, 'Is it gold?' Mason asked me if I had ever seen any native gold. I answered that in 1844 I was in upper Georgia and there saw some native gold, but it was much finer than this and that it was in phials, or in transparent quills; but I said that if this were gold it could be easily tested, first by its malleability and next by acids. I took a piece in my teeth and the metallic luster was perfect. I then called to my clerk, Boden, to bring an axe and hatchet from the back yard. When these were brought I took the largest piece and beat it out flat, and beyond doubt it was metal, and a pure metal. * * * That gold was the first discovered in the Sierra Nevada, which soon revolutionized the whole country, and actually moved the whole civilized world."

On one occasion, when visiting his sister, Mrs. Ewing, Gen. Sherman met four or five Presbyterian clergymen, and his patience was rather severely tried by their religious discussions, and what seemed to him their intolerant and one-sided views. One of them challenged him to offer any excuse for swearing, meeting him with the clinching statement that there could be no redemption for blasphemers. "Were you," inquired the young soldier, "ever at sea in a heavy gale, with spars creaking and sails flapping, and the crew cowardly and incompetent?" "No." "Did you ever," he continued gravely, "try to drive a five-team ox-cart across the prairie?" "No." "Then," said Gen. Sherman, "you know nothing of temptations to blasphemy—you know nothing about extenuating circumstances for blasphemers—you are not competent to judge!"

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Campanini has almost entirely recovered his voice, and is singing again.

It is pretty difficult for the stranded theatrical manager to keep up appearances.

Bob Slavin will not be a member of A High Roller company next season, as announced.

Carmencita will make a tour of the large cities next season, assisted by a band of Spanish students.

"There's one curious thing about these Spanish dancers." "What do you mean?" "Why, the higher they kick the more dust they raise."

The "divine" Sara confesses to being a grandmother. Her grandchild may congratulate himself that his grandmother is also a great grandmother.

A young Mexican never pays for the tickets when he takes a young woman to the theater. The lady's father attends to that and considers himself insulted if the young man proposes to pay.

D'Oyly Carte, it is announced, produces Edward Solomon's new comic opera at the Savoy Theater in April. The subject of Mr. Solomon's latest work is of an Eastern nature, and as yet unnamed.

An actress who recently sued a Scottish newspaper for $5,000 damages on the plea that she had been unfairly criticised in its columns, has very properly lost her case, the learned and upright Judge upholding the right of public criticism.

In addition to a generous proportion of comedy scenes Sunlight and Shadow has a strong texture of refined emotion in it. Holland, Barrymore and Bell and Maud Harrison and Agnes Miller have rarely been better suited in characters.

Mr. Murrie-Hille—"You say you don't dance and that you have scruples against theater-going. What shall we do to amuse you? What do you do at home? I am ready for anything you like. Pretty Country Cousin—"Oh, at home we have church sociables." Mr. Murrie-Hille—"What do you do there?" Pretty Country Cousin (demurely)—"We generally play kissing games."

There is one word of the English language that Mme. Bernhardt has not yet mastered. It is the synonym for "Rodents." Whenever madame has a bilious attack and vents her spite on poor Maurice Grau, he gazes at her with child-like simplicity, closes his eyes and murmurs: "Rats." It acts as a safety valve for his injured feelings, and it is the only redress Maurice has. Madame says the word is not in her dictionary, and Grau refuses to explain.

Henrik Ibsen was a little boor in his boyhood, and even his brothers and sisters disliked him. In revenge for his meanness and unsocial ways they used to pelt him with stones and snowballs.

David Dudley Field at eighty-six says that even if the figures standing for his age were reversed they would make him too old for his feelings—and the adage says that a man is no older than he feels."

Zola says this country is not respectable. It is when we reflect upon Zola's own respectability that we understand just what a compliment this is. If Zola is respectable then we are not, and we rejoice at the fact.

The "literary element" in Boston has taken to attending Chinese dramas performed in the native tongue. The "literary element's" experience with Browning has given it practice enough to understand Chinese at a first hearing.

Timothy M. Healy, the leader of the anti-Parnellite faction of the Irish Home-Rulers, is still a young man, being only in his thirty-sixth year. He was a clerk in a country store at thirteen, and later a stenographer in the employ of an English railway.

Those careless persons who have been content to speak of the author of "The Idle Thoughts of an Idle Fellow," "The Maister of Woodbarrow," "The Open Gate," etc., as Jerome K. Jerome, must make a change. True Englishmen call him Jerrum K. Jerome.

Fanny Fern, the authoress, once said that she never had much opinion of feminine culture in Boston after being called to the window of a lady friend, at whose house in Cambridge she was staying, to look out into the garden and "see the dear little chickens run in under the maternal hen to get their lacteal nourishment."

American fiction must depict American life, and that life is the life of individuals. The contentions, rivalries, strifes, friendships, loves and hates of the Republic are born and sustained by individual character. The picture which is presented of this life, if it is true, must be what the reviewer complains of, and therefore the explanation of the realism, analysis and anatomy of American novelists lies not "in the mental and physical deficiencies of the American nation," but in the conditions and qualities of American life and character.

"The Lost Manuscript," by Gustav Freytag. The manuscript in question forms a part of Tacitus' history, and the professor of this story has at last discovered a clue which may lead to its discovery. The story is interesting from its description of university circles, of country life, and of the vanity fair at the smaller princely courts of Germany. The idea of the continuity and preservation of soul life permeates the whole work. As the author expresses it in the motto he has written for this American edition: "A noble human life does not end on earth with death."

"Wormwood," by Marie Corelli. Wormwood is the name applied by the author to absinthe; and, according to her, absinthe is the cause of all evil—in France, at least. Her story is a sensational warning against the evil that lurks in the opalescent beverage; exaggerated, of course, but deeply interesting. Gaston Beauvais descends to the depths of the animal in his cruelty toward his fallen bride. He commits murder under the influence of the wormwood, breaks away from his early associations, and ends his career in the slums, haunted by the phantoms of impending delirium.

Among the treasures of the two literary societies of the University at Athens, Ga., are many valuable and interesting letters. Rummaging through a pile of these epistles at the Phi Kappa hall, there were found many letters from men who had immortalized themselves—Clay, Calhoun, Webster, Hayne, Davis, Lee. They are their letters of acceptance of honorary membership, or in reply to some letter forwarded them by the society. The most beautiful of all—and, in fact, it may be pronounced one of the most lovely letters ever written—was a letter of acceptance of honorary membership in the Phi Kappa society, written by Theodore O'Hara, the poet.

Dreams have played a most important part in the destiny of man, in the history of the world, and in the literature of the world. They have been the means of bringing us face to face with the mystery of life. All great men had their dreams which influenced them in life. Dante dreamed of a woman's face that filled him with noble purposes. Thomas Moore dreamed of his Utopia, and the literature of the world is the richer. Grant, when but a child, dreamed of conquest, and of being at the head of armed hosts. The dreams of the Crusaders spurred Europe on to advancement. History proves that the dreamer of high and absolute ideas has never made a failure of life.

Judge: "Have you anything to say before sentence is passed upon you?" Prisoner: "The ring I am accused of stealing is not gold, it is fire gilt." Judge: "Gilt being acknowledged, I will only pass a sentence of six years."

"Well," said Judge Henry, "I have made eleven people happy this month, I have married five couples." "Eleven," said John Gruhler, "how can that be five couples." "Oh, I count myself the eleventh, having received $5 for each couple."

"The most eminent jurist now living is our President, Benjamin Harrison," once asserted an Indiana lawyer to a gathering of legal lights in the hotel smoking room. "Oh, Judge, you can't prove any such statement as that," was the immediate response. "I don't have to prove it," answered the Judge, with a twinkle in his eye; "Harrison admits it."

Pryer—"What is the point at issue in the case of Jaggs against Henderson which has been dragging through the courts so long?" Lawyer—"The trouble began over the ownership of a valuable coon dog. The litigation has been going on about six years and has cost the contestants nearly $20,000 so far. Pryer—"Who will win the dog eventually, do you think. Lawyer—"The dog? Oh, he died early in the second year."

An Ottawa correspondent tells the story of a queer incident in the Supreme court. Counsel for the appellant in a case from the west had been for a good half-hour stating his case to the court. Mr. Justice Strong had been talking freely with the counsel, as is his wont, and was apparently helping the timid pleader out, when he started at something the lawyer said and asked: "Are you for the appellant?" "Yes, my lord." "Oh," said the Judge, bluntly, "I thought you were on the other side."

As a rule a man will groan and swear when a dentist tries to fill his teeth, squirming, gripping the arm of the chair and making a big row about it. And the heavier the man the bigger coward he is. I've seen a strapping big athlete sit down to have a tooth pulled and almost faint while I was looking at it. On the other hand, a light, little bit of a woman will calmly close her eyes, lean her head back in the chair and submit to tortures that would make the Sphinx swoon into insensibility. No, sir; a woman can stand a dozen times the pain that a man will undergo.

A couple recently married by a Catholic priest made some fun for the grave clergyman who tied them together with the love-knot of matrimony. The groom didn't know which finger to place the ring upon, and he apologized to the priest for his awkwardness by saying: "You must excuse me, father. I was never married before, and am a trifle green at the business." When the ceremony was ended and the pair pronounced man and wife, the groom gave the bride a great hug, and kissed her full upon the mouth. "Well, my good man," said the astonished priest, "you don't seem to be very green at that." "Oh, no, father," smiled back the happy groom, "I've had plenty of experience at that."

The late Samuel J. Randall was fond, even in the last days of his illness, of relating some of the recollections of his congressional life. Among these was one regarding a chaplain who had been called upon to officiate for the regular clergyman. It was while Mr. Randall served his first term as Speaker of the House. The clergyman was about to conclude his prayer and a reverent silence prevailed the big chamber, when the members were startled to hear the following sentence drop from the chaplain's lips: "May corruption and sin of every form be as far from every member of this body as Thou art, O Lord." It was some moments before the House fully grasped the meaning of the chaplain's prayer, but when it did it was unanimously decided to have a new substitute in case the regular chaplain was unable to attend the next morning's session.

In a western court a witness had been detailing with great minuteness certain conversations which had occurred several years before. Again and again the witness testified to names and dates and precise words, and it became necessary for his cross-examiner to break him up. This was done by a simple device. While the witness was glibly rattling off his testimony the cross-examiner handed him a law-book and said: "Read aloud a paragraph from that book." "What for?" inquired the witness. "I will tell you after you have read it," said the lawyer, and the witness accordingly read aloud a paragraph of most uninteresting material about lands, appurtenances and hereditaments. Then the lawyer went on and asked him a few more questions about his memory, and the witness was positive that his memory was very good. Suddenly the lawyer said: "By the way, will you please repeat that paragraph you just read about lands, appurtenances, and hereditaments?" "Why of course I could not do that," replied the witness. "You must have a queer memory," retorted the lawyer, "since you can repeat things that you say occurred years ago and you cannot repeat what you read a moment ago." The witness was nonplussed.

Solon flourished about the year before Christ 597. The following is related by Plutarch in his "Lives of Great Men: That when Solon was entertained by Thales, at Miletus, he expressed some wonder that he did not marry and raise a family. To this, Thales gave no immediate answer; but some days after he instructed a stranger to say that he came from Athens ten days before. Solon, inquiring what news there was at Athens, the man, according to his instructions, said, "None, except the funeral of a young man, which was attended by the whole city, for he was the son (as they told me) of a person of great honor and of the highest reputation for virtue, who was then abroad upon his travels." "What a miserable man he is," said Solon; "but what was his name?" "I have heard his name," answered the stranger, "but do not recollect it. All I remember is, that there was much talk of his wisdom and justice." Solon, whose apprehensions increased with every reply, was now much disconcerted, and mentioned his own name, asking whether it was not Solon's son that was dead. The stranger answering in the affirmative, he began to beat his head, and to do and say such things as are usual to men in a transport of grief. Then Thales, taking him by the hand, said, with a smile: "These things, which struck down so firm a man as Solon, kept me from marriage and from having children. But take courage, my good friend, for not a word of what has been told you is true." The opinions of great men relative to the matrimonial state have been of interest in all ages; particularly so to the gentler sex. The fair maidens of the State of Maryland, feeling themselves neglected by the lords of creation, are using their inestimable influence upon the Solons of the Legislature to pass a law calculated to make bachelors benedicts, by increasing the taxes of those who remain in the irresponsible state of single blessedness.

NOTES.

When you place your advertisement in a newspaper you compel every subscriber to buy your communication, to hold it in his hands, to bring it before his eyes, and this you do in an unobtrusive way.

A standing committee of the Reichstag, after a prolonged discussion, has decided to bring the question of women's claims for admission to the German universities before the general body of the Reichstag, so that a division may be taken upon it.

A Christian friend of ours in Alameda, in all seriousness and simplicity, says grace at the table in the following quaint style. "God Almighty, sanctify this food to our use, and bless us for value received. Help yourselves gentlemen, for Christ's sake, Amen."

It looks now as though Hon. W. W. Morrow will receive the President's favor in selecting the Appellate Judges created under the late Act of Congress. Mr. Morrow is an applicant for Judge of the 9th Circuit, and with prospects of having his ambition gratified.

"If you would but listen while I entreat," murmurs a bard who appears to be pining away from dyspepsia, "life might be a joy, ma chere." Yes, it might for you, but just think of the girl! The modern American girl wants her young man to do his entreating in intelligible English prose.

There was once a clergyman in this city noted for his long sermons and indolent habits. "How is it," said a man to his neighbor, "that our minister, the laziest man living, writes these infernal long sermons?" "Why," replied the other, "he probably gets to writing and is too lazy to quit."

The year 1854, in California, was one in which there were many tragedies. Among the killed were 241 Americans, 45 Spanish, 17 Irish, 13 French, 7 Germans, 21 Chinamen, 159 Indians; 20 convictions for murder, 25 hung by lynch law, 8 executed by sheriffs, and 4 murdered in fatal duels, making in all 560.

The husband of Mrs. James Brown Potter, the alleged actress, came near meeting his death through a railroad accident. If some act of Providence would dispose of Mrs. James Brown Potter, one avenue for dramatic criticism would forever be closed. But she still lives and engaged in murdering the drama.

The insurrection in Chile has caused a suspension of business, and all the seaport towns have been virtually abandoned. These South American nations are never so supremely happy as when engaged in fighting. If they cannot get up a war among themselves they go into their neighbors' domains and indulge their belligerent propensities.

While Dr. Samuel Johnson was courting his intended wife, in order to try her he told her that he had no property, and moreover that he once had an uncle that was hanged. To which the lady replied that she had no more property than he had, and as to her relatives, although she never had one that was hanged, she had a number that deserved to be.

Of all the human beings we are called upon to meet, those for whom we have the sincerest contempt are the creatures who are continually parading their alleged virtues. The gent who is precious fearful of being corrupted is in our opinion quite as offensive a person as the supersensitive maiden lady who is always professing to be afraid that some odious male is going to kiss her.

There are some things too provokingly serious and too seriously provoking to admit of proper discussion. The stupid action of the committee of the Board of Trade, regarding the measures to secure the necessary apportionment of the water rents, is one of those things. It is passing strange that men of the known business capacity of these men, could arrive at such a conclusion.

The San Francisco Examiner created a sensation in Sacramento Thursday. It is an enterprising daily and gets to bottom facts in a way that certainly puts its contemporaries in the shade. It takes money and brains to run a newspaper. Where there is a barrel of money behind a newspaper a great advantage is given. The Examiner is in that happy situation, and can afford to throw away thousands of dollars to gratify its and the public demand for sensation.

The following appeared in a paper printed in Coloma, May 27, 1854: "A party of six gentlemen from Greenwood, on Wednesday last week, learning that a grizzly was in the vicinity, started in pursuit of him. He was first seen with three younger members of his family by Dr. H. W. Nelson, but a few feet from him and preparing to make a leap. The Doctor leveled his rifle and fired, killing him almost instantly. The other three escaped."

There are often things in the affairs of life, particularly public life, which under the hands of literary contortionists, make sensations, and give a cloudy aspect to individual character. Many reputations have been blasted by what seemed to be moral shortcomings, when if placed under the crucial test of right and justice have no such obloquy attached. We trust the recent sensation of one of our honored citizens may prove a fiction pure and simple.

Quite a joke happened to one of the doctors the other day. He ordered some very powerful medicine for a sick boy, and the father, not liking the looks of it, forced a dose of it down the old cat's throat, and when the doctor called again and inquired if the powder had cured the boy, the father replied: "No, we didn't give it to him." "Good heavens!" exclaimed the doctor, "is the child living?" "Yes," answered the father, "but the old cat isn't; we gave it to her." The doctor took French leave.

The contemptuous attorney, Carpenter, and his client, Vance, came up before his Honor Judge Catlin yesterday morning for final judgment for the violation of an injunction. The parties refused to pay the $200 fine imposed upon each, and each was promptly committed to the county jail for the term of 100 days, or until the fine is paid. It is probable that the prisoners will invoke the writ of habeas corpus, and ask for release from the judgment of contempt. These persons, Carpenter and Vance, are the ones who are trying to secure articles of impeachment against Judge Catlin, growing out of the contempt proceedings. If ever there was a case of deliberate and wilful contempt, these parties come under that head. It is not likely that they will be afforded any comfort either through the ancient writ of habeas corpus, or the extraordinary proceedings by impeachment.

She was young, fair and slender. He was six feet, and a member of the athletic club. They walked along the Capitol Park by moonlight, she resting heavily upon his arm. They talked of love and the future. He admired her for her evident reverence for him and his physical strength. She was like wax in his hands. For a time they walked and talked of love, but when out of sight of inquisitive eyes, his arm gently stole round her waist, and slowly, but with irresistible force, he pressed her to his heart, and upon her lips he imprinted one long, exhaustive and passionate kiss of about ten minutes' duration. He released her, and to his horror and utter amazement she fell prone upon the terrace, a lifeless corpse. In vain, he tried to resuscitate her. His briny tears mingled with the dew. He carefully and tenderly—how he then wished he had been more careful of her in her life-time—carried her to her home. At the post-mortem it was found that she had three ribs broken as well as her nose. The doctors said she died of failure of the action of the heart, notwithstanding which, the Coroner's jury brought in a verdict that she came to her death from excessive hugging. Now, girls, beware of athletic lovers, or use preventives in the shape of pads, braced by steel or whalebone ribs.

Tom Fitch on California.

One of the most enticing features of California is the fact that her springtime comes at a period when the soil of her transmontane sisters is clamped with icy manacles. Here the zephyrs rustle the petals of roses when the unkind wrath of winter causes the denizens of Chicago to seek the companionship of a red-hot stove. Here young Dame Nature washes her dear, smiling face with December rains, and dons her morning gown of flower embroidered lawns just as her Eastern relative is tucking herself in behind snow blankets for a long and bitter night. Crocuses and violets at Christmas, and oleanders and oranges in January, have a charm which can never be dispelled so long as love of nature finds an abiding place in the human breast. We jest sometimes at buying and selling climate, but it is a remarkable commodity nevertheless, and is the only property where the acquisitions of the buyer do not in any degree diminish the possessions of the seller. Our commercial certainties are great; our agricultural resources are enormous; our manufacturing development will, in the near future, amaze the land, for nowhere can ship and rail, coal and raw product, labor and loom be more advantageously connected than in California. But with all our advantages in these particulars, it is climate rather than commerce that lures to these shores the pleasure-seeker, the health-seeker, the wealth-seeker, the home-seeker, the investor and the speculator.

At the close of a W. C. T. U. The lady pleasantly remarks that "She hopes the men in the audience will do as well by her as they do by the saloon men when the collection-box reaches them," when a hard character in the rear calls out, "We will have to give her a stand-off, boys."

Pioneer Prices.

Martin Arentz is known to almost every one in Sacramento. He came to the coast in 1849, and located at Kelsey, a few miles from Coloma, where gold was discovered. Many imagine that prices were very high in '49. So they were, in some things, but the Yankees of Boston overdid the matter in the way of boots and shoes, and they were almost a drug in the market. Martin was a young man, quite dressy, had a neat foot, and was one of the most independent men in the mines. He called one day at Cohen's store, in Kelsey, for a pair of boots. The price was $6.50. Now, Arentz had been down to Coloma the day before, and saw the same article marked $5. He said not a word to Cohen, but getting up next morning at five o'clock, he walked down to Coloma, bought his pair of boots for $5, thereby saving half a dollar, and started for home, expecting to reach there for breakfast. Just as he was turning from Main street to the bridge, a saloon keeper opened his door, bid Martin good morning, and invited him to take a "smile." The two touched glasses, and Martin treated to cigars, twenty-five cents a piece. Just as he was going to start for home another Kelseyite hove in sight. He had in one hand a coffee-mill, and in the other a small package. Martin asked him to "take something," and he "smiled," and it cost Arentz $1.50, for a couple of others "got in." "What are you doing down here so early in the morning?" asked Arentz. "Well, I'll tell you," replied his friend, "that Jew, Cohen, wanted me to pay $1.50 for a coffee-mill, such as I can get here for $1.25, and I came down here and got it; let's have another."

Well, Arentz and his friend stayed in Coloma for two days. Arentz had his $6 boots swung over his shoulder, while his friend carried his $1.25 coffee-mill in his hand. They afterwards inquired up expenses as follows: One pair of boots, $513.25. One coffee-mill, $815.50.

Secretary Windom's Last Story.

A few minutes before Secretary Windom entered the banquet hall at Delmonico's that fatal night, he met Bill Nye in the lobby of the hostelry. For years the late Secretary and Nye were the closest of friends, and many a joke has been discussed between them.

"Do you know, Mr. Nye," remarked the Secretary, "that every time I see you I think of Senator Wade and his experience. What have you never heard the story?" the Secretary continued. "Well, it's so good I'll tell it to you. Wade, as you remember, was devoid of hair on his head and always wore a wig of raven black. One day, just as he had concluded a very strong speech in Congress, he was waited upon in the lobby of the Capitol by a young woman.

"Senator," began the young woman, "I have listened to every word you have uttered to-day with the greatest of interest, and oh, what a gallant man you are! Would you object to giving me a curl of your hair to carry home to Ohio with me?"

"Why, certainly, madam, you can have it all," answered the Senator, removing the wig and handing it to the astonished young woman.

This was the last story told by the dead Secretary.

ELECTION NOTICE.

THERE WILL BE AN ELECTION IN THIS CITY
TUESDAY, MARCH 10, 1891,

When the following City Officers are to be elected, viz:
THIRD TRUSTEE.
CITY AUDITOR.
CITY ASSESSOR.
CITY COLLECTOR.
FIRE COMMISSIONER—FULL TERM.
FIRE COMMISSIONER—SHORT TERM.

Whereas, the city of Sacramento, by authority of the Board of Police Commissioners of said city, a body duly established by law and invested with the power to appoint and elect members of the police force of said city under authority of an Act of the Legislature of the State of California, entitled "An Act to amend an Act amendatory of and supplementary to an Act approved March 25, 1863, entitled an Act to incorporate the city of Sacramento," approved March 14, 1889, created and incurred an indebtedness by the employment of a number of policemen in excess of the number authorized by the said amended Act of the Legislature of 1863; and

Whereas, The Legislature of 1891 passed an Act which was duly approved on the 20th day of February, 1891, providing for the submission to a vote of the people the proposition of levying a Special Tax to pay any indebtedness incurred by municipal corporations during the years 1880 and 1890; therefore he it

Resolved, by the Board of Trustees of the city of Sacramento, that the question of raising the sum of $18,000 by the levy of a special tax for the purpose of paying the indebtedness created and incurred as aforesaid, be submitted to a vote of the qualified electors of said city of Sacramento at the municipal election to be held in said city on the 10th day of March, 1891.

Resolved, That following the names of the candidates of the respective political parties on the tickets printed and to be voted at said municipal election, the following words shall be printed: "For the special tax—yes." Electors desiring to vote in favor of said proposed special tax shall vote as follows: "For the special tax—yes," and those desiring to vote against said proposed special tax, shall erase or scratch with ink or a pencil the word, "Yes," and substitute therefor and write in the same manner opposite said words, "For the special tax," the word "No."

Resolved, That the words "For the special tax—yes" shall be printed upon said tickets or ballots, and the votes upon said proposition shall be counted in the manner prescribed by the laws of the State of California, relating to the printing and counting of election ballots.

The election will be conducted according to the General Election Law, excepting the election returns must be made to the Clerk of the Board of City Trustees.

The qualification of voters is that their names are on the Great Register of Sacramento county. The polls will open at sunrise and close at 5 o'clock P. M.

The following are the Precincts, Polling-places, Inspectors, Judges and Clerks of said election:

DRAMATIC NOTES.

A Barrel of Money will be given at the Metropolitan on March 9th and 10th. The comedy is said to be good.

Last night The Sea King was produced for the first time in this city. There was a large audience and the musical comedy was received with great enthusiasm. The costumes were gorgeous, scenery new and fine. The company is thoroughly good.

A philosophical individual once refused point blank to lend £50 to a bosom friend. "Well, I did not expect that of you," said the would-be borrower, rising and preparing to leave indignantly. "I will never forgive you for this refusal." "Of course you won't, my dear fellow," replied the philosopher, with the utmost calmness; "but if I'd lent you the £50 you wouldn't have paid me and we should have quarreled about that, so it's as well to get the row over at once. Good morning."

It now transpires that Queen Margaret of Italy had not a little to do with the overthrow of Crispi. Victoria's hatred of Chancellor Bismarck is said to have contributed largely to the causes compelling that diplomat's retirement. When anything of grave moment happens in politics or elsewhere wise people look around for the woman in the case—and they generally find her.

A Splendid Tribute.

In the March number of the Occidental Medical Times we find the following beautiful tribute to the memory of Dr. H. W. Nelson, from the pen of Dr. W. R. Cluness. We give the article in full:

Dr. H. W. Nelson was born near Sorel, Province of Quebec, Dominion of Canada, May 15, 1826. A farmer's son, his early years were divided between farm work and the common schools of his native place. At the age of 16 he was apprenticed as a student of medicine to his uncle, the late Dr. Robert Nelson, then residing at Montreal. Another uncle was Dr. Wolfred Nelson, who flourished during the American Revolution. During the period of his medical studies Dr. Nelson acquired a knowledge of Latin sufficient to pass the matriculation examination to college, and at the age of 21 years obtained the degree of M. D. from the College of Physicians and Surgeons at Montreal, now known as Bishop's College. Early in 1849, when barely 23 years of age, he yielded to the allurements of the new El Dorado, and started for California in company with his uncle, Dr. Robert Nelson, and a few intimate friends. They traveled across the Republic of Mexico to Mazatlan, where they were obliged to wait until they could find a suitable vessel. After a delay of several days they succeeded in securing passage on the Talca bound for San Francisco, where they arrived August 4, 1849. The uncle, Dr. Robert Nelson, remained and practised his profession in that city, and is believed to have been the first medical man on the Pacific Coast to perform abdominal section for pedunculated fibroid tumor of the uterus, but I am unable to recall the year when this occurred. Young Dr. Nelson proceeded to the mining regions, and settled at Mormon Island, Sacramento county, where he established the first hospital north of San Francisco. At this date gold dust was the ordinary currency of California, and the tariff for hospital accommodation, including professional attendance, was one ounce per diem. This was also the usual fee for a visit to a patient outside, with mileage additional for going beyond the limits of town or camp. In 1850 he removed to Georgetown, El Dorado county, and from there to Dutch Flat, Placer county, in 1859. Finally, in 1871, he settled at Sacramento, which continued to be his home the remainder of his life. As a general practitioner his reputation spread far and wide, and by most of the elder members of the profession he is kindly remembered. But his skill as a surgeon, especially, made him famous, and for many years he was foremost in this branch of his calling among the mining communities of the mountain regions. In the literary work of the profession he was never conspicuous, though after his settlement at Sacramento he contributed some creditable articles to medical journals. His leading personal trait was scrupulous honesty in all relations and transactions. I have heard him say, when smarting under some injustice at the hands of a confrère: "How can any man be so ungenerous? How can any one do a wrong act when it is so easy to do right?" Generous to a fault; social to an extreme; convivial sometimes to excess; living for today, without care for the morrow, he never acquired wealth, though opportunities were within easy reach. He remained a bachelor until December 28, 1882, when he married Mrs. Elizabeth Moore, who survives him, but he leaves no children. Dr. Nelson inherited an excellent constitution, and enjoyed constant health until about three months before his death, which was due to heart failure, growing out of fatty degeneration. He was attended most faithfully by his devoted wife up to the end, which was on February 4, 1891. Dr. Nelson had been a member of the Sacramento Society for Medical Improvement from the date of his settlement here until a few years ago, when he withdrew, in the conviction that the Society was inflicting a grievous wrong on a worthy member. In this protest he then stood alone, but it must be recorded to his credit that the Society subsequently rescinded its objectionable action by a unanimous vote. In recent years he occasionally attended its meetings, but never resumed membership. Meanwhile he became a member of the Pioneers' Association, of Sacramento. Although he had not fulfilled the full measure of years, his career was so active that he had more than accomplished the average life's work, and it was well done. As to his faults, no one can charge him with injustice. Beyond that, "Let him who is without sin cast the first stone." W. R. C.

Drunk (striking old friend for a dollar)—"Everything gone; nothing left but an appetite. Let me have a dollar, will you?" Old Friend—"Here's the money; now, go and fill up. Drunk (two hours later)—"Took your advice, old friend; am full."

In a well-filled horse-car, a two-year-old child toddles across the car and cries, while holding out its arms, "Papa, papa," to a well-dressed man. He was not at all disconcerted, but looking the child's beautiful mother full in the face, said: "I am not your father, my little one, but God knows I would like to be." "I am a widow," replied the child's mother.

Press Comments.

The Winters Express says: With its issue of Saturday last, THEMIS, published at Sacramento, entered upon its third year. THEMIS is a clean, well edited paper, and our ideal of a good journal. It is especially valuable to old Californians for its historical articles, which are prepared with care, and treat of the pioneer days of this State with exactness, in a charming way. We wish our friend THEMIS continued prosperity and long life.

The Hayward Journal has the following: The Sacramento THEMIS, one of the brightest literary weeklies in the State, has just entered its third year. THEMIS is Republican in politics, and made a brilliant fight during the past canvass, and its talented managing editor, A. J. Johnston, afterwards gracefully slid into the position of State Printer. We met Bro. Johnston on the rialto, so to speak, during the recent political skirmish, but it was merely temporary. However, long life to the sparkling THEMIS.

The Gridley Herald says: Sacramento's literary journal, THEMIS, has passed another milestone. It's uphill work to establish a literary publication of so high a standard. Its proprietors have put it on a successful basis, however. It is the neatest paper on our table.

Blackmail in Ancient Times.

In the beginning of the eighteenth century the Scottish Highlands, and part of the Lowlands bordering on the Highlands, were in an extremely barbarous state, enjoying but an imperfect protection under the law. Theft and robbery were not then regarded as they are now; to carry off the cattle of a neighbor was perhaps only wreaking out an old family feud or clan dispute. In these circumstances a class of men rose up who proposed to take upon themselves the duty of protecting the property of individuals on the payment by them of a percentage on their rents, generally 4 per cent. This was known as blackmail. Notwithstanding the fact that nearly all of these men were of good Highland families, there was only too good reason to suspect that they encouraged and profited by robberies in order to make the blackmail a necessity. About 1730 the celebrated Rob Roy was a notable levier of blackmail in the southern Highlands. The levier of the impost held himself bound to pay an equivalent for all cattle which were lost by the payers of blackmail which he was unable to recover. Blackmail ceased to be heard of after the breaking out of the rebellion under the young Pretender in 1745, and the word was gradually identified with the blackmail of modern society.

Napoleon's Superstition.

Napoleon's devoted Mamaluke in Mme. Rhea's play, entitled Josephine, is a somewhat exaggerated character, but he is a reality of history. When Bonaparte gave over his splendid dream of a grand Asiatic empire, audaciously declared all his own purposes accomplished and the designs of his enemy entirely frustrated, and when, with his army, after its terrible march, he entered the Cairo in all the magnificence of an Eastern conqueror, a descendant of Mahomet presented to him a fine horse, with a saddle adorned with precious gems, and a young slave who held the bridle. This slave was Rustan, the Mamaluke of the Emperor.

Thereafter Rustan was, in fact, the devoted slave of Napoleon, and the Emperor returned his devotion with a singular confidence that brought them to the same plane of imagination and superstition. Rustan was with the Emperor in the campaign in Russia, and when Napoleon left the remnant of the grand army to its still uncertain fate, and hastened to Paris to save his reputation and his crown, Rustan was one of the half dozen companions he took with him. The native superstition of his race, his own origin and his strange experience, blended with confidential intercourse with so extraordinary a character as Napoleon, made Rustan a strange and mysterious personage to even his most intelligent contemporaries. In the modern play he is made to appear as a kind of gypsy fortune teller.

Rustan faithfully believed in fate and the stars, and as Napoleon affected the same belief, it was doubtless very agreeable to the Emperor to have about him one who sincerely accepted this belief and who religiously believed all his martyr's fanciful utterances. Napoleon claimed that Nature stepped aside from its course for the purpose of his creation. He was accustomed to hear this idea reflected in the flattery of those who surrounded him, but he probably knew very well that the only man in all France who unqualifiedly believed all that he claimed, was this wild Mamaluke. The modern play attributes the devotion of Rustan to gratitude to Napoleon, and that instead of keeping him a bridle-holder the great soldier brought him, as he might a faithful dog, to be his bedroom guardian.

A Strange Delusion.

Years ago, away back in the early 70's, one of the leading families of North Davenport, Iowa, were possessed of an only daughter, fair of form and face, whom they had betrothed to a young gentleman of good family living in the neighboring city of Dubuque (all names being withheld out of consideration for these good people, who still reside in the cities named). Everything was arranged for a speedy marriage of the young pair, when the happy prospective bride took sick and died. The grief of the young man was dry-eyed but terrible when he saw his loved one arrayed for the bridal of death instead of for a union with himself. He followed the remains to the Oakdale cemetery, returned home in an abstracted sort of manner, only to be stricken with nervous fever the same night. Then a peculiar hallucination took possession of his fevered brain—he believed the lost one to be present with him in the room. His parents gently but vainly remonstrated with him, yet he would talk to her that should have been his bride, describe her dress and appearance to those attending on him in his delirium, even though others would sit or stand where he declared her to be. Finding that he was rapidly sinking under this peculiar delusion, it was decided to array a young lady in clothes that were an exact counterpart of those in which the bride-elect had been buried, and which were the same the young man declared were worn by her when she visited him in the spirit. While he was sleeping, this well-meaning counterfeit took her station in the room, anxiously awaiting the outcome. When he did awake, he turned his eyes to the spot, flung his arms aloft, and shrieked in an unearthly voice, "My God, there are two of them!" Gasping which he fell back and expired.

Wanted to Exchange.

A solid, sensible-looking woman, who was bound east, entered the baggage-room of a Boston depot, leading a dog, and asked: "Can this dog go on the car with me?" "No, ma'am." "Has he got to go in the baggage car?" "Yes'm." "Is it extra?" "Fifty cents." "Well, it's a shame!" "Yes'm, but it's the rule." She walked about for five minutes, the dog sniffing at her heels, and then returned to say: "There are three of us—myself, the dog and my husband."

"Yes." "If my husband went in the baggage car, couldn't the dog ride in the seat with me?" She managed to choke down her indignation when told that no such change could be effected, but later on, in the waiting-room, she was giving her husband fits, and it was probably because he was satisfied with the rule of the road.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to DAVID KIZER, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 24th day of January, 1891, in which action, Annie Kizer is plaintiff, and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of said Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between plaintiff and defendant on the grounds of desertion and failure to provide; also, for the care, custody and control of the minor children, the issue of said marriage, viz: Nettie and Edna, aged 5 years, and 15 months respectively, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made; and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL.] and affix the seal of said Court, this 29th day of January A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk. By J. F. DOODY, Deputy Clerk.

W. A. GETT, JR., Attorney for Plaintiff. ja31-9t

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California.—In the matter of Warren Starr, an insolvent debtor.—Warren Starr, having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, from which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said Warren Starr is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said Warren Starr, insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent to him, or to any person, firm, corporation or association for his use; and the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Hon. A. P. Catlin, Judge of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court-room of said Court, in the County of Sacramento, on the 13th day of March 1891, at 10 o'clock, A. M. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered, that the order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published, before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And it is further ordered, that, in the meantime, all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated February 4th, 1891. W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge of the Superior Court.

W. A. ANDERSON, Attorney for insolvent.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO.—In the Superior Court.—In the matter of the petition of W. C. Hays, an insolvent debtor. Upon reading and filing the petition, schedule and inventory of W. C. Hays, the above named petitioner, and on motion of L. S. Taylor, his attorney, it is ordered and declared that said petitioner is insolvent. And it is ordered that the Sheriff of the County of Sacramento do take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of said insolvent debtor (except such as may be by law exempt from execution), and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee. And all persons are forbidden to pay any debts to said debtor, or to deliver any property belonging to such debtor to him, or to any one for his use, and said debtor is forbidden to transfer any property to any one except said Sheriff. And it is further ordered that a meeting of all creditors of said debtor be held on Monday, the 6th day of March, 1891, at 10 o'clock, A. M., at the Court-room of the Superior Court aforesaid, in the Court-house in the City of Sacramento, to prove their debts, and choose one or more assignees of the estate; and that a copy of this order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation, as often as said paper is published before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And all proceedings against the said insolvent are hereby stayed. Sacramento, January 23, 1891. A. P. CATLIN, Judge of the Superior Court.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. Barclay, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court-room of said Court, on the 10th day of April, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M., of that day, to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. Dated, February 25th, 1891. A. P. CATLIN, Judge of the Superior Court.

Did the Sun Wink His Eye?

Women are doing all things within the range of possibility to make themselves charming as to complexion. There is one extreme of treatment into which few women have been initiated. It is the daily sun bath. A Wall street man conceived the idea that his wife could be benefited in looks if she were exposed for two hours each day to the beneficent rays of the warm, purifying sun. He accordingly had constructed on the south side of his mansion a room with many windows and a glass roof. Into this each day he persuaded his wife to go for a sunning, and history relates that the lady's skin grew fair, soft and lovely, and that it was acceptable in the eyes of her lord.

One vivacious evening my lord told the story to an interested crowd of listeners at the Union League Club, and fired their ambition to become the owners of women so seductively sweet. For a time there was a perfect craze for building these sun-bath rooms, and it is related that the price of glass went up until glaziers and carpenters were as scarce, as independent and as expensive as the most bowtellous of plumbers. When the glass rooms were completed, and the ladies of the Four Hundred seated in them respectively, ye gods and little fishes, what a sight would have been there if the roofs of the houses had suddenly been lifted off! New York would have been the fairest spot on all the earth. The sun would not have taken the time to blink his eye, nor would he have been known to hide himself behind a cloud.—N. Y. World.

Two Little Stories of Gambling.

"The biggest money I ever saw on a gambling table at one time," said a guest of a St. Louis hotel, "was $22,000, and I saw that at Spokane Falls, Wash., last year, just after the big fire. Everybody had plenty of money, and all kinds of gambling shaps were running in tents, houses, either brick or frame, being few and far between. The little tent had a faro bank and three men called the turn. There was $22,000 in cash on the table, and $20 gold pieces were used as chips. They all lost and the house scooped in the pot."

"That is a good story," said a bystander, "but I will tell what I saw in Tucson, Arizona, Christmas night, 1883. I was a stranger, and wandered into the gambling-room by accident. Everything was wide open in those days. I saw sitting at a faro-bank table an army officer, a Chinaman, a negro, a Mexican, an Indian and a woman. I watched the game for more than an hour, and the Chinaman and the woman were the only ones who quit winners."

"Father, I saw a man laying drunk down at the market house." "You should not say laying my son—hens lay." "But I have seen men lay too." "Oh! no my son." "Yes, but I have seen them lay bricks."

HE MARCHED WITH SHERMAN TO THE SEA;

Trudged all the way on foot, over mountain and through morass, carrying knapsack and gun, slept on brush heaps to keep out of the mud, caught cold, from the effects of which his friends thought he would never recover. Lingered with slow consumption for many years, he saw Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery advertised in a country newspaper, and he determined to try it. A few bottles worked a change, six months' continued use cured him. Always too independent to ask his country for a pension, he now says he needs none. He helped save his country, he saved himself! Consumption is Lung-scurf, for scrofula, in all its myriad forms, the "Discovery" is an unequalled remedy. It cleanses the system of all blood-taints from whatever cause arising, and cures all Skin and Scalp Diseases, Salt-rheum, Tetter, Eczema, and kindred ailments. It is guaranteed to benefit or cure in all diseases for which it is recommended, or money paid for it will be refunded. Sold by druggists.

The Pleasures of Poverty.

If half we hear about the dangers to which the rich are exposed is true, then is the poor man a person to be envied.

For instance, we are told that there is no worse breeder of disease than paper currency. The dirty, furry feeling dollar of commerce, it is said, is a regular asylum for germs of all sorts. Diphtheria can be carried from house to house by a circulating five-dollar bill; nor are the microbes too aristocratic to take up their abode in minor denominations. The milled edges of our silver coin form a convenient resting place for homeless bacilli whose delight, it is said, is to move out of the coin into the system of its possessor at the first opportunity, basely deserting their offspring, which lie in wait for the next man to acquire all right, title and interest in the milled edges aforesaid.

Then, in the writing of multitudinous check lies pen paralysis. In the clipping of coupons lurks thumb disorders of the most virulent type, to say nothing of the tremendous loss of time with which all large holders of bonds are confronted on "pay day."

These troubles are apart from the responsibilities which wealth entails. Many a man of large income shatters his health in his efforts to get rid of it; and if, on the other hand, he shirks his duty in the matter of spending it, he is likely to ruin his disposition and reputation in hoarding it, for no one has ever yet encountered a miser with decent feelings or a good name. In addition to these, there is always a sense of insecurity, which breeds insomnia. What man among us, possessing the securities referred to, can sleep, or even eat, drink and be merry, after reading in his morning newspaper that, "owing to the rate war in Kansas the P. V. F. & W. R. R. is about to pass its dividend and default on its bonds?"

To the man with nothing these misfortunes never come, and he is, therefore, a fit subject for congratulatory verse by the late Dr. Watts, who might have written:

I would not be a millionaire,
Exposed to every ill,
But rather that poor fellow there
Who owns no dollar bill;
Who hath no store of filthy dross
Within his coffers pent—
He'll never know the pain of loss
Who never had a cent.

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, MARCH 14, 1891.

No. 4.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by J. H. MILLER & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
J. H. MILLER, Managing Editor.

Time and again has THEMIS believed that a fit season had come when we should controvert the charges of venality that have been and are being repeated by the press of the State against the present Legislature, but as often as we have set ourself to the task something has occurred at the Capitol which has caused us to desist from our purpose. There is no doubt whatever that there are mercenaries in the Legislature, but it is not a fact that that body can be bought up as one might buy up a drove of cattle. The fact of the matter is that the present Legislature will compare favorably with any Legislature that has convened in the last twenty years, but the members conduct themselves in such a way as to make it impossible for any clean and independent newspaper to defend them. Men who are notoriously incorruptible behave in such a way—talk of ‘boodle’ and ‘sacks’ with such indifference, and express with such carelessness the opinion that certain of their fellow members are venal—that one cannot separate the sheep from the goats. It is not necessary to specify with particularity the relative number of honest and purchasable men who sit at the Capitol and make laws; the great majority of them are upright, but they behave so like rascals—that it is as certain as anything in the world that if the present body of legislators had constituted a part of the population of Sodom and Gomorrah at the time Abraham besought the Lord to spare those cities, the patriarch would have lost his case. Moreover, if the Almighty should go into the fire-and-brimstone business again, and select California as the scene of His exploits—if the cry should go up, as it went up from Sodom and Gomorrah, and he should say:

“I will go down now and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it, which has come unto me; and if not, I will know;”

and if He should take the outward conduct of legislators as a guide to what He might do—if the matter of finding fifty or twenty righteous were confined to the Legislature—we should be wiped out as a people. This would come to pass, not because there are more hireling men than there are just men in the Legislature, but because the just men behave as if they were hirelings. There is no dignity or sense of decorum about the Legislature. Statesmen meet together and talk about money being behind a certain bill, or about a ‘sack’ having been raised for this purpose or that, or about a statement having been made that certain of their fellow members have been ‘hit with boodle,’ with as much unconcern as if they were discussing the coming vintage or the price of wheat. Admitting them to be incorruptible, how would it be possible for THEMIS, or any other clean journal, to uphold the characters of such men?

Take the proceedings that took place in the Senate last Saturday, and the position that Senators Heacock and Bailey placed themselves in when the bill creating the county of Riverside came up for passage, as an illustration. The San Francisco Post had charged that a ‘sack’ of $21,750 had been raised wherewith to buy votes enough to insure the passage of the bill. Senator Heacock arose and read the article, and stated that he entertained no doubt whatever that an attempt was being made to buy a few Senators, and called upon every member that had been ‘approached’ to arise in his place and name the amount of the bribe that had been offered him. This was an edifying and likewise an enrapturing spectacle, truly. But what followed surpassed anything that has ever taken place in this State, or anywhere else, for that matter. Statesman Bailey, of Santa Clara, arose to his full stature, and, after putting his Adam’s apple in the proper position to make his voice heard throughout the chamber, remarked: “Now, brethren, you see the state of the case. There is a pile of ‘boodle,’ amounting to $21,750, and for your own sakes, for the sakes of your wives and children, and for the sake of the reputation of the State, I hope and trust that none of you will fall down before it.” And then the bill was passed. How can any self-respecting newspaper or person entertain a polite regard for a body that will sit quiet under such rasping lectures as these? One involuntarily thinks of a number of empty bags endeavoring to sustain each other in a perpendicular position. Just think of McKinley of Ohio, or Breckenridge of Kentucky, or Henry Cabot Lodge of Massachusetts, or William S. Holman of Indiana, arising in the House of Representatives and remarking: “Boys, there’s a ‘sack’ around; be sure that none of you get hit by it.” The California Senate is not a bad body; on the contrary, it is a very respectable assembly. But who in the deuce could help such men as compose it, seeing that they behave as they do. It required two angels to get Lot out of Sodom before the fire and brimstone storm set in, for Lot wanted to stay; or, at the most, didn’t want to go further than a little city near by. No one need be surprised if these same two angels should come along in a short time for Statesmen Heacock and Bailey.

The foregoing was written before the report became current that the various candidates for the Federal Senatorship had employed private detectives for the purpose, if possible, of preventing vote buying; or, at least, to keep the run of the number of legislators that sell out. We are not advised as to whether this report can be substantiated or not; but we intend to investigate the matter and give our opinion in the next issue of THEMIS. However, THEMIS wishes to call Statesman Bailey’s attention to a certain incident which is narrated in the Bible, before he proceeds to burn up any brother Senator. The matter has a direct bearing on the burning business, an account of which will be found in Genesis xxxviii. A certain Judah determined to burn a woman named Tamar, the same being his daughter-in-law, on account of her over-familiarity with men. Tamar was in an interesting condition:

“When she was brought forth, she sent to her father-in-law, saying, By the man whose these are, am I with child; and she said, Discover, I pray thee, whose are these, the signet, and bracelets, and staff.”

And, lo! they all belonged to Judah; and he desisted, and the woman was set free. So we say that Statesman Bailey should have a care as to the disposition that he may have made of his bracelets, and staff, and signet before he roasts anyone.

The result of the election for city officers, last Tuesday, is a healthful indication of municipal reform. In addition to this, the Republican party in this city has become unified. While there yet may remain a discordant element, which would not be satisfied if it had the absolute dictation of the party policy, it is pretty well established that there will be no longer any considerable factional strife, save perhaps some personal contests, in the party lines. The vote given Geo. A. Putnam and J. J. Buckley is, perhaps, the true indices of the actual strength of the straight-out Republicans in the late contest. Against these gentlemen there did not appear any factional strife. The majority given Mr. Conklin, under the circumstances, was flattering, indeed. This is a decided verdict of the people against the loose and extravagant administration of our municipal affairs. It is a declaration in line with the platform of the party, which, in a terse and comprehensive manner, fixes the real issues involved. We cannot epitomize better than by recalling this declaration of principles.

1. As in the past, we recognize the Republican party as the party of progress and principle. It is always safe to rely on the action of the united Republican party for good, patriotic and economical governmental administration, national, state and municipal.

2. We deprecate any dissensions in the party lines, prompted by selfish ambition, or the rapacity of any faction or clique, and pronounce against all unfair attempts to control our primaries or conventions in the interest of any person or clique. One of the tenets of the Republican party demands ‘fair elections.’ This doctrine must be extended to all primary elections of the party.

3. We view all the side issues, under whatever name designated, whereby Republicans are drawn away from party fealty, as the invention of the enemy, and calculated solely to inure to Democratic supremacy, national, state and municipal. Our experience in this city teaches us the full realization of this fact, and the feeble local government discloses that there is always danger in this temporizing idea.

4. We pledge our candidates to an economical administration of all municipal affairs on sound business principles, to the end that taxation may be reduced to the lowest possible figure.

5. We are in favor of radical reforms in the police department that will give us a harmonious and efficient force of competent officers. We favor such sanitary and police regulations as will insure the health, safety and improvement of our city, and demand the vigorous enforcement of such regulations, laws and ordinances.

6. We look upon the apportionment of 55 per cent. of the gross revenue from water rates as a calamity ominous to the city, and favor any lawful means to prevent the diversion of such funds from the support of the water works and the improvement of the system.

The last clause is one vital to the interest of the taxpayers, and we are pleased at public verdict in its favor. There are very many avenues of wastefulness in our city government, which we feel assured, under the new regime will be closed. Mr. Young, as the Auditor, has the extraordinary power of the veto and, with his well-known firmness of character, will not hesitate to use it when necessary for economical government. The people of Sacramento are to be congratulated on this happy turn in the tide of municipal administration.

The alleged ‘good society’ is in all respects a tyrant. Being a tyrant it is unreasoning as well as unreasonable. When some so-called ‘leader’ adopts an odd garment, or affects a new notion of how company should be received, or how a dinner should be served, at once there is a following which makes this foolish idea a law in the inner circles of ‘good society.’ Society rules are actually invoked for the guidance of religious circles and rites. There is a bright writer in the editorial columns of the New York World who does not fear to beard the society lions in their dens. He thinks there is nothing funnier than the insincere conventions of society. There are no rules of logic or reason employed in these circles. There is no law, other than that of society which is weak, in society matters. When the simple edicts of society go forth, it becomes a law absolute so far as society is concerned. Now Lent used to be a religious rite, and its observance meant an acknowledgment of devotion, and those who practiced this observation were earnest and sincere. But the society idea is entirely different—it is not the Lent of the Church, but the working of society. The Church restraints were a little too irksome, so one by one the worldly pleasures took their places until Lent has become the creature of society. It remains fashionable, however, to pretend to the possession of principles, and so there are still concessions made. As nearly as can be stated in a general way, society now surrenders the dance. This is the great and central concession. It is true that other pleasures are given up. People who have no especial taste for the drama do not go to the theater. Dyspeptics surrender sweets and pastry. The gouty refuse to take twenty-mile walks, but as a general rule dancing is the tub thrown to the Church. The giving of a dance is a social duty. It is a painful and expensive social duty. It is intended as one agonizing bit of return for favors received. So stern and exacting a social duty appeals very strongly to the society matron when she is considering what sacrifice she shall make for Lent. Moreover, there is a physical reason. The buds are the dancers and balls keep them up a trifle late. When Lent comes they are very likely to be pale and worn, and the mid-winter rest is a wholesome interval between the gayety of the winter and that of the summer. Of course it flirts, for society would not be society did it not flirt. It plays at whist, too, and is even now engaged in taking lessons in that art which it will never master, for lack of time and other prerequisites to success. When we consider the foolish requirements of so-called "good society," it is little wonder that there is such a prejudice against it by the thinking and reasoning masses. The insipid creatures that pose as the great social leaders, are enough to make a sensible man or woman nauseated at the stomach. Their silly aping of foreign customs are un-American in every sense.

John F. Swift, the United States Minister to Japan, is dead. The announcement came from the State Department at Washington, and fell to the people of this State, and, we may say, to the people of the entire nation, with painful suddenness. Mr. Swift was a man of national repute, and while unpretentious, his abilities were recognized; perhaps, however, not to the extent the worth of the man deserved. He was of courage, in that he combatted powers before which others cringed. Whatever of political defeats he sustained resulted for his antagonism to elements concerned in politics from mercenary ends only; and from the fact that he would not stoop to be a demagogue. In 1886 he was nominated by the Republican convention to be Governor. He conducted a dignified and manly campaign. He should have been elected, but his defeat was largely brought about through the malevolence of Mr. Pixley. The letter Mr. Swift then wrote was drawn out by Pixley, it would seem, purposely to injure, and was a political movement we can never endorse. While it contributed to his defeat for the office of Governor, and while it resulted, by reason of the death of Governor Bartlett, in giving us the administration of Waterman, there has been the satisfaction that the national administration recognized in Mr. Swift one fitted to fill a position in the Cabinet, and doubtless had the selection been from this coast, it would have fallen to him.

Some people who, in the past have evinced little respect for the orders and decrees as well as the honor of Courts, have been taught by pretty dear experience that it is not safe to display any willful contempts. The lesson given to Carpenter and his client, Vance, is not only a warning to them, but all others, that they must not ignore orders, or use contemptuous language in the presence of Courts. A wholesome lesson was also administered to a young fellow who thought he could run the Police Court for Judge Cravens. When he serves his 100 days for his remark she may be a wiser man, if not a better one. There has been too much laxity in the administration of justice, which has given rise to these contemptuous acts. The first duty of the citizen is to respect our Courts, for if there is any disrespect to the judiciary, the principal stay of government is weakened.

It is again reported that Senator Sherman intends to retire from public life at the close of his present term in 1893. It is to be hoped that such is not his purpose. He is still in the full vigor of intellectual strength and his country cannot spare him. Men of his stamp are all too scarce even now.

MARINE DISASTERS.

Lists of Vessels Wrecked on the Pacific Coast.

The loss of life and property on our lakes, rivers and the ocean grow less and less each year. Not many years ago, the only means of inland communication was by the old-fashioned stage-coach and river and lake steamboats. To-day, railroads thread our country in every direction, the stage-coach is a thing of the past, and the river and lake steamers carry only freight. In the early days the steam-boilers were not so well-constructed as now, and explosions, accompanied with frightful loss of life, were of frequent occurrence. The Atlantic ocean steamers to-day are perfect floating palaces, made of steel, and their machinery is so perfect that they have almost the speed of a locomotive.

The loss of the vessel just outside the Golden Gate, some weeks since, recalls many disasters that have occurred on the coast. THEMIS has collected all the shipwrecks and loss to river boats that have occurred on this coast since 1849, and will present them to its readers in a series of articles.

In 1852, the following are recorded:

January 28th—The propeller Sea Gull, wrecked on Humboldt bar. No lives were lost.

January 31st—The propeller General Warren, lost on the Columbia river bar. Four of the crew were drowned; ten only reaching the shore alive.

February 27th—Steamer North America, fifty miles below Acapulco. The passengers and crew were rescued by passing steamers.

July 12th—The ship Oxford, fifty miles from the heads.

August 10th—Steam propeller Bishop was wrecked off Point Bonita.

October 24th—City of Pittsburg was burned at Valparaiso.

November 1st—Schooner Willimantic, at Gray's Harbor. Two were drowned. The steward and a boy, unwilling to trust the boats, remained with the wreck until rescued January 13th by the people living on the coast. They subsisted upon a handful of peas per day.

In 1853 we find the following recorded:

On January 6th—The Sacramento river steamers J. Bragdon and Comanche collided five miles above Benicia. In was in broad daylight, both steamers were going at full speed, and apparently, the pilots made no effort to prevent the collision. The Comanche immediately sunk, and ten lives were lost, among them Alderman Barker, of Sacramento. The Comanche was raised, repaired and for years afterwards plied the muddy waters of the Sacramento.

January 6th—The pilot ship Sea Witch went ashore on Aitch Rock in San Francisco harbor.

January 7th—The ship Aberdeen went ashore near Fort Point, where ship Samoset was wrecked a few months before.

January 12th—The barques Inindora and J. Marethen and the ship Vanderbilt were wrecked on the Columbia river. In the same storm the ship Roanoke was wrecked on Umpqua bar.

February 16th—Steamer Independence off Margueretta island. She struck a reef and began to fill with water. She started for shore under a full headway of steam, but unfortunately took fire. Between the two elements, two hundred men, women and children lost their lives.

April 9th—The steamer S. S. Lewis wrecked just inside the Golden Gate. All the passengers were saved, among them, the late and lamented General W. T. Sherman. He graphically describes the disaster in his memoirs.

April 11th—Steamer Jenny Lind exploded her boilers near Alviso, killing seven persons and wounding a large number.

May 21st—The river steamer R. K. Page exploded her boilers near Nicolaus, a few miles above Sacramento city, killing a large number of passengers, including Daniel Moore, her former captain, and Thos. Kirby, her former pilot.

May 22d—Steamer Tennessee, in Bolinas bay.

July 25th—The store-ship Manco and the brig Canonicus were burned in San Francisco harbor.

October 18th—The steamer American Eagle exploded her boilers on the San Joaquin river, killing four persons. On the afternoon of the same day the steamer City of Stockton met with a similar accident, in which two were killed.

November 8th—The ship Anson was driven ashore at Port Townsend. About the same date the British ship Jenny Lind was wrecked at Rialto Cove, and the news of the loss of the steamer Winfield Scott was received. Her passengers were rescued from the rock Ana Capa on the 9th of December, seven days after the wreck, by the steamer California.

In 1854, the records show the following:

January 8th—The ferry-boat Ranger exploded her boilers on the Alameda mud flats, killing two men.

January 13th—The steamer Belle collided with the steamer Kate Kearny in Suisun bay. The Belle went to the bottom, but her passengers and crew were taken on board the Kearny.

January 19th—The steamer Helen Hensley exploded her boilers at the San Francisco wharf, killing two men and injuring many. She was just about to pull out of the slip, preparatory to starting for Sacramento.

February 8th—Clipper ship San Francisco, just outside the Golden Gate. She was a new vessel of fine construction and this was her first trip. The passengers and crew were saved, but the vessel and cargo were a total loss.

February 14th—Schooner San Mateo capsized in a squall in San Francisco harbor. All on board were lost.

February 24th—Propeller Fire Fly sank on the Columbia river bar and four lives were lost.

April 8th—Steamer Gazelle exploded her boilers at Canemah, Oregon, killing twenty persons and injuring many more.

April 15th—Steamer Secretary exploded her boilers opposite the "Two Brothers" in San Francisco bay, and thirty lives were lost.

April 21st—Bark William Claxton foundered off the Mendocino coast. Eleven of the crew found watery graves.

April 22d—Clipper ship Golden Fleece drifted ashore near Fort Point.

May 11th—Ship Townsend destroyed by fire just after rounding Cape Horn, and twelve live were lost. Some of those who were saved were on the ocean in small boats weeks before they were picked up.

June 4th—Steamer Arespe wrecked at Point Arenas. All on board were rescued.

September 4th—The British barque Emily Thompson went ashore at San Simeon bar.

October 2d—Steamer Yankee Blade struck on Point Aquilla. The boats were lowered, and in casting off one of them capsized, drowning thirty, most of whom were women and children. Those who remained on the wreck were rescued by the tug-boat Goliah and the steamer Brother Jonathan. The steamer sailed from San Francisco for Panama, and had on board 800 passengers and $153,000 in specie. On the evening of the same day, the steamers Sonora and Cortes of the rival line, sailed for the same destination. It was understood that there was to be racing between them, and there had been considerable betting upon the time that would be made. As soon as they got outside of the heads, the Yankee Blade raised her flag in challenge to the Sonora and steamed away. She was compelled to lay to for several hours during the night on account of fog. At 7 o'clock in the morning, the fog continuing, the appearance of the water indicated land. A line was thrown to take soundings, and a moment afterwards the vessel struck heavily. In a moment all was terror and confusion. The officers of the boat lost all self-possession and control of the vessel. In the confusion, during the absence of the captain and first-mate, a gang of ruffians took possession of the boats, and having raided the bar and maddened themselves with whisky, pillaged and outraged the peaceful passengers. One man who resisted was shot and several knocked down and beaten. The scene was one of unbridled passion and violence. The ruffians took possession of the life preservers, and when the vessel was threatening to go down at any moment, extorted large sums of money from the terrified passengers. Soon after the rescue, the steamer went down. Many of the passengers who, after years of hardship in the mines had started home with a competency, returned to San Francisco penniless, being compelled to leave their possessions on the stranded vessel. It is estimated that their losses in this way aggregated half a million dollars.

October 14th—The steamer Napa sunk in the straits of Carquinas.

December 9th—The steamer New World snagged and sunk in the river eight miles below Sacramento city. She had some 300 passengers on board, all of whom crowded upon the upper deck. They remained on board all night.

December 26th—The steamer Southern lost on the Columbia river. All on board were saved.

A Reaction.

It is just four hundred years since Greek was first taught at an English-speaking university, and the study of it created so great enthusiasm that six years later the fame of Oxford teachers of Greek attracted Erasmus from Rotterdam to its halls of learning. In 1516 he published his first edition of the Greek Testament, and from his second edition Luther translated the New Testament into German. The effect of this study of Greek on our language, then in its early formative period, and on our philosophy and religious belief, is beyond the power of any scholar to trace or estimate. It has been a predominant element in shaping thought and argument and imagination and expression. We do not read a book or listen to an address, or sing a hymn or even converse on themes relating to intellectual, emotional, and spiritual life, without being indirectly benefited by the study of Greek which has for four hundred years been a part of the regular curriculum of our higher schools of learning. The present reaction against making Greek essential to a liberal education is not, to our thinking, to the advantage of culture or of good morals. Its great classics furnish examples of as profound philosophy, as great strength of reasoning, and as sustained flights of imagination, as have ever been produced in any tongue. While its ideal made æsthetics more prominent than ethics, its development was toward an ethical monotheism which at last, in the writings of Philo, almost touched the apostles' conception of God incarnate in human flesh. Its tragedies furnish a tonic to the conscience unapproached save in the writings of the Old and New Testament. If the first aim of education is to develop the whole man, in order to fit him so to pursue special studies as best to serve mankind, then the study of Greek is one of the most effective means to that end. A notable sign of changing views as to the instruments and aims of higher education was a session of headmasters recently held at Oxford. There, in the stronghold of Greek study, where it first entered into English university life, the resolution that Greek should no longer be compulsory was defeated only by a vote of thirty-two to twenty-nine. The reasons urged were also significant; that many are kept from entering universities because Greek is required; that many who do enter merely cram Greek without caring for any thorough knowledge of it; and that a man's studies should be confined to subjects related to the calling in life which he proposes to pursue. This, plainly enough, shows a lowering of the idea of education which can not but manifest itself in narrowing characters of educated people in the coming generation.—Boston Congregationalist.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Modern Dramatist—I've got another order for a new play. Wife—Did the manager furnish you with the plot? Dramatist—Yes—er—that is, he showed me all the scenery he had.

Fanny Rice will star next season under the management of H. S. Taylor, in a musical extravaganza, Everything Goes. It was written for her by John J. McNally and Chas. T. Vincent.

Why does not Sara Bernhardt set the dog on that bold, bad actor who is following her over the country with his hypnotic influence? But perhaps he has a hypnotic cinch on the dog, too.

Dashaway—The other night I went to an amateur theatrical performance, and then I went home and had a terrible dream. Cleverton—What did you dream? Dashaway—I dreamed I went to it again.

Staggerly (manager of the Empire Minstrels, in the box office)—What is that fearful noise? Box Keeper—The people are all leaving the house. Perhaps there is a fire. Staggerly (angrily)—No, I can imagine what has happened; one of the end men has been getting off a new joke.

Sol Smith Russell, the comedian, has a handsome blonde brother, who is City Attorney of Minneapolis, Minn., says the New York Continent. He induced "Sol" to buy in a brick block in the center of the city some time ago. When the comedian became its landlord it was full of people; but soon after the chief tenant failed, the others moved out, and the block has been an expense ever since. The comedian meets this by raising the price on the property each year.

An anecdote is going the rounds in Australia concerning the manner in which a well-known leading actor supplied the accidental absence of a necessary item of "make-up." He was playing Macbeth, and when he came to the murder scene he asked in vain for blood, with which he had intended to imbrue his hands. After abusing the property man roundly for his neglect, the actor, struck with a happy thought, suddenly hit the functionary on the nose, so that a good supply of crimson fluid was obtained; and in this the actor bathed his palms.

Wagner ended the great "Trilogy" simply with a soprano solo. Berlioz ended almost every work with a paroxysm of fury, employing the entire forces of an abnormally large orchestra. Just as Poe delighted to end his tales with some fierce bit of horror or sensationalism, Berlioz demanded some infernal scene or wild frenzy to finish his musical works with. The end of the Damnation of Faust presents a scene in hades, and the finale of the Symphonie Fantastique is placed in the same warm latitude. The finale of the Childe Harold symphony pictures a bacchanalian orgie of brigands on the Abruzzi mountains. Certainly the pendulum has swung too far in this matter of wild endings. In the latter part of the last century the finale was generally jovial in character, to put the audience in a good humor after a symphony or suite. This joviality, to which both Mozart and Hayden assented, ended by becoming trivial; and it is to Beethoven that we owe the reform which gave to such works an earnest close. Far different from these genial endings of the past are these violent terminations of the present. It is not only Berlioz who sins in this respect. Raff's Lenore symphony ends with a spectral gallop to perdition, and his Im Walde closes with a spectral hunt. It is time that the sensational should be a little restricted in modern music. Art should be a presentation of the beautiful, not of the repulsive. If evil is portrayed, it should be with a view of showing the good in greater contrast. When the evil is present in larger proportion than the good, the mission of art has ceased. Music has a much higher mission than merely to excite; it must elevate as well, and these musical ghost stories and portrayals of pandemonium certainly do not accomplish the latter result. Schumann and Wagner have gone quite as far in the direction of dissonance as it is safe to proceed, but these abnormal tone pictures go many steps beyond them, from a necessity born of their terrific subjects. Beethoven probably gave the subject of symphonic ending as careful consideration as any one, as is well proved by the different forms he used in the ending of these works. Let him be the model for these latter day sensationalists; and above all, let it be understood that there is no artistic necessity for making the finale of symphony or cantata a chamber of horrors.

Book Chat.

The marriage of Victor Hugo's granddaughter with a son of Alphonse Daudet, the French Novelist, has given rise to the discussion of the question whether it is proper or not to embellish in any manner whatsoever the simple procedure of civil marriage, without which no matrimonial alliance possesses legality in France. It appears that the civil marriage of the granddaughter of the great revolutionary poet was not the simple, almost trivial, affair which Sardou in his "Daniel Rochat" represents this important legal act to be.

"Famous or Infamous," by Bertha Thomas.—A young English actor of great promise marries the daughter of London's foremost critic. The woman, who has inherited her father's mighty intellect, guides her husband's genius and restrains and counteracts the weaknesses of his character, fully understanding the complexity of the mind of genius and its dangers. At the zenith of his glory the actor brings out a play by an unknown dramatist, and succeeds in making it known. The author visits him, and a new love springs up in the heart of the actor's wife, who forgets all to follow this man of her choice.

"Ruffino," and other stories, by Ouida.—The Duke of Castiglione returns hurriedly to Rome to be present at the death-bed of his father, the Prince of Montefeltro. From the terrace of the palace Castiglione can see a squalid street, and in one of its houses he discovers ere long a beautiful young girl, who works from break of day till late at night. He ascertains that she is a Russian, and that she supports her dying brother, a Count and proscribed nihilist, with the labor of her hands. Ruffino is Castiglione's dog, which plays a creditable part in the love story. The other stories are: Trottolino, An Orchard, and The Bulfinch.

At Berlin there are two scraps of papyrus containing fragments of passages which have been referred to by some German scholars to the treatise in question. It is interesting to note that both passages are found in the British Museum's papyrus. The museum has thus, it appears, had the luck of acquiring for a song and by an accident one of the oldest Greek manuscripts in the world. Happily there is promise in the circumstances of its finding that other discoveries of like interest may be made by and by. Egyptian graves and ruined buildings have possibly still richer treasures in reserve. The discovery of manuscripts of classical Greek authors written on papyrus began but fifty years ago. In that time four or five nearly complete orations of the great Athenian orator, Hyperides, have been recovered; also fragments of Euripides and of Alcman. There have also been obtained besides early copies of portions of Homer, Thucydides, Plato, Demosthenes, Isocrates, and others. The work of Aristotle, just recovered, does not, of course, radically alter the main lines of Greek history as recited by Herodotus and Thucydides.

Professional Chat.

Victim—Doctor, I'm troubled with cold feet. What do you suppose causes them? Doctor—Cold weather; three dollars, please!

If Cain had been able to secure a lawyer, the first verdict of "not guilty" would probably have been recorded in the Bible.

Rum has killed more Senators in Congress than ever yet sat in the Capitol during any session. It has destroyed more English lords than ever sat at one time in the House of Peers.

Soon after Secretary Foster was elected Governor of Ohio, which was then an October State, he came to New York, says the Tribune, to take part in the campaign, and took a room in the Fifth Avenue Hotel. A friend who called found him in his room resting after his journey. The Governor-elect touched a bell and asked the waiter who appeared to bring him some cigars. Presently the waiter returned with four cigars in his hand. "Look here," said Mr. Foster, holding them up, "this comes of being elected Governor. I have always had six for a dollar here before."

Daniel Dougherty, in his descriptions of the oratorical style of well-known members of Parliament, pictures Timothy M. Healy, anti-Parnellite, in this way: Dougherty throws back his coat-tails, thrusts his hands deep into his pockets, and, assuming the accent and manner of the wild Hibernian, exclaims: "Where did yez git the land? Where, I ax yez, did yez git it? Yez stoled it!"

James Harrington, of Chicago, was helplessly drunk and was arraigned before Magistrate Bradwell. Harrington pleaded guilty, but said in explanation: "I am a telegraph operator and some days ago I lost my head to such an extent that I took to drinking rather hard. It will never occur again if you let me go this time." The Justice, being an old knight of the key, tapped on the desk with a pencil a signal meaning: "Will you reform if I let you go? Answer me by signal." Instantly the answer came back by signal: "I will, as God is my judge." "Then you may go, Harrington. Try to behave yourself for your family's sake," ticked the Court on the judicial desk.

King Milan of Servia is enjoying his visit to England immensely. He came originally on the invitation of some friends in the country, to stay only four or five days; but he has already staid as many weeks and is even believed to contemplate settling in hospitable Albion for good. What he enjoys in London—like the king in exile of Daudet's story—is his complete freedom and absence of all that toadying, from which even an abdicated monarch is not always able to rid himself. The king has been made an honorary member of one of the best west end clubs, and makes his exits and entrances there and elsewhere without anybody to bow or scrape or in any way to treat him differently from anybody else. In Paris he was not allowed even to amuse himself without attracting notice.

Some of Bishop Magee's endowments have proved to be double-edged tools. The exercise of sarcasm sometimes gives such pleasure to the wielder of the intellectual weapon that he forgets to ask himself whether the victim is equally delighted. The curate who begged that he might derive some advantage from the prevailing shower of livings, and was offered an umbrella, is believed not to have seen the joke. The worthy mayor who complained that his invitation to a civic banquet had been answered from the palace on a post-card, and was promised a large sheet of foolscap next time, is understood to have regarded the gibe as indecorous. Even the eminent lawyer who reminded the bishop that he would have to deal with the burials question, and received for answer, "It's not the dealing I mind, it's the shuffling," may think it more graceful for him to repeat the remark than for the bishop to have made it.

Gen. Beatty came to Washington during Gen. Grant's administration, writes a Cincinnati Enquirer correspondent, when the public places were so overrun with Ohio men that there was an every-day joke about it, and called at the White House to ask for the appointment of someboby who lived in his district. He made an earnest statement of the case and then waited to see what impression he had made on the President. After a minute of silence the President gave a long, lazy puff of smoke from his cigar and reflectively observed: "Well, Gen. Beatty, Ohio really ought to have something." Beatty pressed the case no further, but made his escape as soon as he could with politeness. The President is said to be very proud of his appointment of Foster. Perhaps he thinks he ought to have the Athenian, too. He is going to adapt Shakespeare's philosophy to the Ohio case and say: "Can one desire too much of a good thing?"

The late Archbishop of York, Dr. Thompson, used to tell a good story about himself which is too good to lose. He had been dining with a friend several miles from his residence at Bishopthorpe. After dinner he ordered his carriage to drive him home, and when about to enter he noticed that his coachman was rather shaky on the box, and also that his voice was anything but clear. Before the carriage had proceeded far it became evident that the coachman was incapable of driving with safety, so there was nothing for it but for the archbishop to exchange places with him if he wished to arrive home safely. Having deposited the "Jehu" inside he mounted the box and all went well until the narrow road up to the stables was reached. Here the carriage was driven over several large "spars" which were lying by the side of the road. The noise caused by the collision attracted the stable boy, who seized hold of the horses' heads and led them into the yard, muttering the while some not-over-choice language at the coachman for his carelessness. "You old fool! Drunk again!" A light from the stable revealed the shovel hat. "Well! Why, you've got the old cock's hat!" The archbishop thought the joke had gone quite far enough, and said: "No; it's the old cock himself."

NOTES.

The idea of the "Light of the World" was suggested to Sir Edwin Arnold by Henry M. Stanley.

The legislator who votes to abolish the Fish Commission ought to be drowned, and he who favors the abolition of the Forestry Commission ought to be hanged to the limb of a tree.

Literary men in London who think they need spirituous inspiration, spur their intellect with frequent libations of gin. This was Byron's favorite tippie when he had literary work to do.

We can't tolerate a fool, but can admire a scamp for what he might have been. It is that inconsistency that makes a woman adore the reckless, dashing, dissipated rascal, over the "correct," "good" man.

India-rubber tires, from one to two inches in thickness, are now used on carriages of the better quality. They prevent the annoying and uncomfortable jolting and clattering which result when iron tires are employed.

Pecan nut farming is one of the most profitable industries of the Gulf States. After the trees have once begun to bear they involve no labor or expense, and yield an income of from $500 to $1,000 an acre, according to the quality of the nuts.

There are three towns in this State which resemble the New Jerusalem in this, that their streets are paved with gold. They are Georgetown, Auburn and Folsom. After the late rains gold was picked up in their streets as follows: Georgetown, $108.25; Folsom, $96.50; and Auburn, $68. These towns were built upon very rich placers, which have never been worked.

A maid was walking on the street one day, A bold, bad cyclone came 'long her way, It missed her bangs and tipped her hat, And caught ahold and pulled her wrap, It gave her form a lively squeeze, And raised her clothes above her ankles, Showing what would any but a saint enmesh; The maiden quickly fled and cried: "That horrid thing is too awful fresh!"

Rosa Bonheur, the great animal painter, is a short-built, firm-faced woman of imperious manner, with closely-cropped white hair parted at the side, and lives in an incongruously constructed chateau at Fontainebleau, on the outskirts of Paris. She affects masculine attire, and is at her easel daily at an abnormal early hour. She has a large number of pets and has fitted up an impromptu stable in connection with her studio for the convenience of the animals she transfers to canvas. Her greatest picture is called the "Horse Fair," and is on exhibition in the Central Park Museum. She is sixty-eight.

An Eastern scientist has demonstrated the following scientific facts: At the depth of about 3,500 feet in the ocean, waves are not felt. The temperature is the same, varying only a trifle from the ice of the North Pole to the burning sun of the equator. A mile down (5,280 feet) the water has a pressure of over a ton to the square inch. If a box six feet wide were filled with sea water, and the water were allowed to evaporate under the sun, there would be two inches of salt left on the bottom. Taking the average depth of the ocean to be three miles, there would be a layer of pure salt 250 feet thick on the bed of the Atlantic, if the oceanic water were to evaporate. The water is colder at the bottom than at the surface. In many bays on the coast of Norway, the water often freezes at the bottom before it does above.

A business woman—and all women worth considering merit that appellation, at least part of the time—should wear clothing as light as is consistent with warmth, and as simple as is consistent with beauty. She should neither wear forty pounds of jet beads to fetter her, nor gew-gaw ornamentation which put beauty at a disadvantage and make plainness hideous. She should have stout shoes, rubber boots when necessary, and a Mackintosh. Her dress should end not less than four inches above the ground, and be loose enough so that she can pick up a paper off the floor, or take down a book from a shelf a foot and a half above her head, with perfect comfort. The cloak should not be of fur, which is too heavy, but of cloth, plain in appearance, giving full liberty to the arms, and provided with a change pocket, at least, perhaps others.

As a woman was walking a man looked at and followed her. "Why," said she, "do you follow me?" "Because I have fallen in love with you." "Why so? My sister, who is coming after, is much handsomer than I am; go and make love to her." The man turned back and saw a woman with an ugly face, and being greatly displeased, returned and said: "Why, you told me a story." She answered: "Neither did you tell me the truth, for if you are in love with me, why did you look for another woman?"

Buchanan and Fremont.

The following appeared in the Sacramento Herald in its issue of Dec. 16th, 1855. It was the testimony of James Buchanan, the Secretary of State, upon the character of John C. Fremont. At the following presidential campaign they were opposing candidates. The article reads as follows:

The last steamer from England brought an important document, in which two of the candidates now before the people for the Presidency prominently figure. It is a certified copy of the evidence for the defense in the case of Gibbs vs. Fremont, being the copy of depositions taken before Commissioners under the authority of the Court of Common Pleas, London, in 1852. It will be remembered that Col. Fremont was arrested in London on account of debts contracted in California. The defense was, that these debts were contracted on account of the United States Government. Col. Fremont drew bills of exchange to the amount of nineteen thousand five hundred dollars upon the Secretary of State of the United States, the liabilities having been incurred on government account while Col. Fremont was Governor of California. The bills fell into the hands of persons in London, and being protested for non-acceptance, the holders sought to hold Col. Fremont personally liable. The evidence of James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania—upon whom, as Secretary of State, the bills were drawn—being considered material to the issue, the Court appointed Henry L. Gilpin, Hugh Campbell, and Peter McCall, of Philadelphia, Commissioners to take depositions of witnesses for Col. Fremont, in Pennsylvania. They were to be sworn and then administer oaths to the interpreters, clerks, etc.—the testimony so taken to be sent under seal to Sir James Parke, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas.

The testimony, as published in several of the Eastern papers, is very voluminous. We have only room this morning to give a single question propounded by the Commissioners, and the answer of James Buchanan, given under oath:

QUESTION—Do you know who was the person in actual command of the land forces of the Government of the United States in California, in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-seven, and in the month of March in that year?

ANSWER—Col. Fremont, the defendant, was in California at the commencement of hostilities between the United States and the Republic of Mexico; he there raised and commanded a battalion of California volunteers, consisting of about 400 men; his services were very valuable; he bore a conspicuous part in the conquest of California, and in my opinion is better entitled to be called "the conqueror of California" than any other man; he continued in the actual command of this battalion throughout the month of March, 1847, but there were other troops in California—other troops of the United States—under the command of Gen. Kearny, who was afterward the Military Commandant and Governor of California, as I have already stated in my answer to the eighth interrogatory; I cannot undertake to decide the dispute to which I have already referred between Col. Fremont and Gen. Kearny; but as long as the California battalion existed they were under the separate and independent command of Col. Fremont, while Gen. Kearny commanded the other troops of the United States; for the rest of the year I refer to my next preceding answer.

We ask the attention of our readers to all the documents in the case, which will be found in the New York Times and Tribune.

Another Crosses the River.

The Auburn Republican, in its last issue, had the following:

Tourists to Lake Tahoe all knew E. Clement, and most of them knew him by the name of "Yank." Mr. Clement died last Sunday, at his hotel, called the Cascade, located in Lake Valley, just across the line from Placer in El Dorado county. Mr. Clement was a pioneer at Lake Tahoe and had lived on its borders for thirty years. He kept a hotel for summer visitors, and thousands of people from all over the United States will remember the genial "Yank." He suffered losses by fire and storm, which kept him comparatively poor, but he was never down-hearted or discouraged, and after three disastrous fires which destroyed his buildings, he as many times rebuilt and began business anew. He built the present Tallac Hotel a few years ago, but for the greater part of the time his residence has been at Lake Valley, where the road leads out to Placerville, and in the flush times he made some money. He had been a great fisherman in his day, and always spent the winter at the lake, no matter how bad the weather. "Yank" was rough in his manner of dress and rugged in appearance, and wore a long, white beard, which, with nearly 80 years, gave him a venerable appearance. He leaves a widow but no children.

Patent medicines have paid to the British Government during the present year, $1,100,000 in the shape of duties and taxes.

He Always Got Left.

Anthony Brown is a well-known character about town. There is nothing bad about the fellow. He is impecunious, but his pleasant address and suavity of manner, make him quite a favorite, and whenever any one treats to the drinks Brown is called in and always with uplifted glass, addressing the man who is treating, he repeats Rip Van Winkle's famous toast. Brown is always looking for work, but invariably "gets left." On Monday last he was promised employment at one of the down-town produce stores and instructed to be on hand at 8 o'clock the next morning sharp. Brown was delighted. There was an opportunity to do something for himself, an opening that might take him from poverty to affluence. He arose the next morning at 6 o'clock, reversed his paper collar, dressed himself the best he could in his much-worn garments, and started down town. When he got as far as Congress Hall he stepped in to see his friend Clark. "Tom," he said, addressing Clark, "at last I have secured employment. No longer will I be 'sparring' my friends for drinks, no longer can the charge be made against me that I am a 'lunch fend.' I am to get $15 per week down here at Strong & Co.'s for handling potatoes. Let's take something." The two suited, and twenty cents went down on the slate to Brown. He stepped into The Office and made the same statement to the proprietor, Rego. They drank, and again the "slate" was brought into requisition. The next place he halted at was Corbin's. He stepped up and addressed the proprietor familiarly as "Jim," told him the same story as he had the others, and they both smiled.

By this time the sun was high in the heavens and Brown was pretty well fixed, having taken a tumblerful at each drink. He arrived just ten minutes too late, and another man was put in his place. He came back to Corbin's, told of his bad luck, and took one for better luck next time. He repeated the same thing at Rego's, and wound up at Congress Hall. "Well, Clark," said he, "I am left again. Better luck next time; let's have something."

The bottle was placed before him and he took a long and deep drink, partially to drown his disappointment, but more particularly because the brand of whisky suited him.

About an hour afterwards he was found lying upon the sidewalk, helplessly drunk. Clark suggested that they take him to an undertaker's shop and put him in a coffin. The suggestion was acted upon immediately. Brown was placed in a pine box and a man stationed to watch the result when he awoke from his stupor. About an hour later an ice-cream vender passed through the alley blowing his horn. This aroused Brown. He sat up in his coffin, and looking around, seeing only unoccupied caskets, he exclaimed: "Gabriel has tooted his horn, and I am left again."

A curious notion has seized society of late and taken its most exclusive members to Delmonico's to supper on Sunday nights. I was very much surprised last Sunday upon going to a late dinner about 8:30 to find that the usual run of strangers congregated there Sundays had all gone away and that the dining-room was given over entirely to people whose names are synonymous with all that is large and haughty in the social fabric of the town. They were all bobbing about from one table to another speaking the jargon of their set with all the fluency of long practice. It was a curious jargon—and not a particularly pleasant one. The majority of society people are not good mimics. Undoubtedly they know enough Englishmen to select copies of unexceptionable quality, and doubtless they have in mind men who speak English correctly, but they make woeeful imitations of them. They start in with the apparent idea of lengthening the vowel sounds after the English fashion, but they do not know where to stop. An Englishman says after with a very long a and he gives a similar breadth to the same vowel in pass. But he would be astounded and shocked if anybody should accuse him of pronouncing matches mahtches, or hand hawnd, yet these two words were pronounced in this fashion by a man near my table who wore a single glass and whose social position is unimpeachable.

"The Duchess" of current fiction, whose real name is Margaret Hungerford, is a brown-haired, merry-eyed, youthful-looking woman. Yet she is the mother of six children and the author of twenty-seven novels. The story goes that some ten years since her husband committed a forgery for which he was imprisoned, and that his wife, being thrown upon the world without any source of livelihood, turned in despair to literature. When a girl she had earned the sobriquet of the "Duchess" because of her aristocratic bearing, and signed it to her first book "Phyllis." It proved a huge success, and she has ever since maintained herself handsomely by her prolific pen.

A man never gets too old for his mother to stop calling him "her boy."

The Lover and the Wind.

Await! good wind,—one moment stay,
A word to thee I fain would say,—
Thou art just come from yonder west,
Where dwells the one that I love best,—
Please wait, good wind, and do not go,
There is something I want to know.

Alack! It is I fear a hopeless task,
To gain response to what I ask.—
I gave my heart to a maid one day,
You but just passed her on your way,—
Please wait, good wind, I want to know
The answer to my question, ere you go.

Fair and shapely is the maid I mean,
The maid I am certain you have seen,—
You dallied with the tresses of her hair,
And kissed her brow, all unaware,— Nay, good wind! Oh, do not go,
'Tis but one thing, I want to know.

Was my heart in that maiden's breast?
The maid whose form you gently pressed,—
Was my heart reflected in her eye?
The maiden you but just passed by,—
Ah, cruel wind! And why not tell,
You could if you would, you know very well.

JOHN AUDLEY.

The Dentist's Parrot.

At the Albany dental rooms in Wilkesbarre, they have a parrot who greatly assists in the work of extracting teeth. The parrot's name is Caesar. He is a fine specimen of his species, his intelligence being something marvelous. Dr. Weller, who has charge of the rooms, says he would not part with the bird for any money. And no wonder; the parrot brings grist to his mill. The bird does its work this way:

A man comes to have his tooth pulled. He gets into the chair and then his courage fails him. He tells the dentist that the pain has gone away, and that he will postpone the operation until the next day. In nine cases out of ten the dentist is unable to persuade the patient that it will be to his bodily comfort to have the molar extracted. Then, when the man gets out of his chair, the parrot, who has been watching him all the time, takes him in charge.

"Oh, coward," yells the parrot, "you haven't the nerve of a chicken."

The man looks around in consternation. The parrot is partly hidden in his cage behind a screen. The man with the tooth-ache turns around to the knight of the forceps, and inquires:

"What remarks were those you just made. 'I said nothing,' replies the dentist, "it was the parrot who was speaking."

The gentleman is then introduced to the parrot. A pleasant conversation ensues.

"Nice morning," says the parrot, "tooth pulled? No! You better; you catch cold when you go out; better have it out and be done with it; lot people had teeth pulled this morning."

The man with the tooth-ache is so dumfounded over the parrot's talk that he hardly knows which way to turn for the time being. Then the parrot urges him on again, saying:

"Go on, it will only take a minute; the doctor is waiting for you."

This is too much for the man. He goes back to the chair and has the tooth removed. Then the parrot jumps all around his cage and says: "Oh, ain't I happy; I feel so happy with my big tooth out."

"That parrot," says the dentist, "can talk anybody into getting a tooth pulled. We had a farmer in the other day. He wanted all his teeth pulled out and a new set made. We wanted him to take gas. The old man said: 'Well now, by gosh, I don't know about that. I often heard of people blowing out gas and then dying; I don't think I will risk it.' "Good boy," shouted the parrot; 'sensible man; don't you take gas; just sit down there and pulling your teeth will be as easy as husking corn.' When the farmer looked around and saw the parrot he said: 'Well, I declare; why that bird talked like a man. I guess I'll take his advice and let you crack away at my chawers.' There was no trouble in pulling the old man's first two teeth, but when the third came he jumped two feet in his chair. 'That was a uerve clincher,' said the parrot; 'it won't happen again; just keep nice and quiet now and soon your teeth will be out.' This soothing advice had a calming effect on the farmer, and he sank back into his chair, perfectly satisfied with what had taken place and what was to come. When the job was finished the parrot said: 'Well done; there isn't one man in a thousand who could go through such an ordeal; you must have a wonderful constitution!' The farmer smiled and said he guessed he had."

Mrs. Pompus—Yes, my dear, I must say that though she is real sweet and ladylike in her manners, I cannot but suspicion that she is no better than an imposture in society.

Mrs. Gampus—Sakes! you don't say so, dear. Why, what reason have you to think that?

Mrs. Pompus—Huh! Reason enough, I just guess. Why, she wrote me a note yesterday, and there wasn't a mistake of spelling into it. I shouldn't wonder if she'd been on the stage, or even a school teacher.

FLASHES.

One thing a colored beauty can do, she can blush unseen.

If we never speak ill of our neighbors we can always avoid trouble.

When a good fellow hugs a good girl, is he not making a waste place glad.

When the world is full of cheap literature it is little wonder that some of it is nasty.

A man never expresses so much in his face as when he is trying to appear unconscious.

Most of our modern people's time is engrossed in finding out how their neighbors live.

Whistling of bullets used to be a terror, but the whistling of modern airs are more effective—in a certain way.

The Sacramento river is something like a financial panic—it has made a run on its bank. Result: Broken bank in Yolo.

The American sovereign thinks too much of reforming others to look to himself. We always find the alleged reformer blind to his own shortcomings.

If there is any good in a man it will come out when he meets adversity. If vicious, his propensities for evil will develop under the same circumstances.

When we hear a person say "I regret to say," then we know he or she is taking pleasure in announcing the misfortune of some fellow creature.

Chicken Thief Killed.

Robert Robinson, who lives at Twenty-second and N streets, lost a number of his chickens lately. He threatened vengeance upon the poultry thief, and borrowed a shotgun from a neighbor for the avowed purpose of killing the rascal should he detect him in the act of robbing the hen-roost. On Monday night, just at dark, he observed the rascal stealthily enter the back gate and seize one of his choicest fowls. This was too much for Robinson; he leveled his gun, pulled the trigger, and the robber, filled with lead, lay dead in the back yard. The neighbors assembled, viewed the remains, and complimented Robinson on his marksmanship, all agreeing that the rascal had met with a deserved fate.

The Coroner was not notified, neither were the police telephoned for, and the remains lay in the back yard over night. Early the next morning the body was thrown into a cart, hauled over the north levee and buried, uncoffined, in one of the sand dunes. There were no papers found upon his person to lead to his identity. His build and dress would indicate that his ancestors came from New Foundland. He wore a brass collar, on which was engraved the word "Fido."

New Firm.

Charles Rood and Benjamin Johnson have taken a long lease of the State House hotel. Both of these gentlemen are well known, not only in this city but to the traveling public throughout the State. Mr. Johnson has been employed on the corner of Tenth and K for twenty-seven years, during all that time being associated with Luther Harris. He is a genial gentleman, counts his every acquaintance a friend, and in this he makes no mistake. Mr. Rood was chief clerk of the State House nearly continuously for seventeen years, and served in that capacity under the late "Hod" Eldred, during the time that the hotel was the most popular of its class in the State. He is a gentleman who thoroughly understands the hotel business in all its details. He is broad-gauge, liberal, and will serve the public in the best style possible. Under the management of Rood & Johnson, the State House will soon regain its old-time position at the head of its class.

She Forgot Something.

She was a tidy-looking girl of eighteen, but rather over-dressed and a bit too vain. She took a car, and as she sat down it was noticed that she carried one glove loose in her hand. This was to display the four rings on the fingers of that plump and pretty member. The gloves were not quite forty rods long, and they did not have quite one hundred buttons each. They came as near it as fashion demands, however, and the girl looked pleased and satisfied. She had been riding less than five minutes when she suddenly stood up and motioned for the car to stop, and half a minute later was out of sight. Then it was noticed that she had left the glove on the seat, and a boy about six years of age eyed it attentively for a few seconds and then whispered to his mother beside him loud enough for all to hear:

"Ma! ma! She's gone off and forgot one of her stockings!"

In the Parisian cemeteries it is now customary to place metal boxes on the tombstones. Each box has a slit on the top, and in it visitors drop their cards. The relatives can thus see the names of persons who cherish the memory of the deceased.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The next attraction will be All the Comforts of Home, which will be given on March 22d and 23d.

The great African explorer, H. M. Stauley, will lecture here on March 17. Those who have read his books will be anxious to hear some of his adventures from his own lips.

The Sacramento theater-loving public are enjoying a genuine treat this week. Commencing on Thursday night, Marie Wainwright gave Twelfth Night, or What You Will, repeating the same Friday night. When last here the little lady captured all in "Beatrice." As "Viola" she again won our favor. We do not relish the wanton liberties taken by some person or persons in deviating from Shakespeare's text. When these literary butchers think they can improve the immortal bard, they mistake the sentiment of the literary world of to-day. Twelfth Night has not been improved by the changes made by the party who has presented Miss Wainwright's present version. In a large number of the old and best plays, managers have interpolated modern notions, which serve only to destroy the real merit of the plays. Notably this can be observed in School for Scandal and The Rivals. In each of these startling plays there have been added scenes that were foreign to the author's ideas, and which in fact destroyed the real merits of certain characters. We don't like these liberties taken with Shakespeare, whatever may be done with the work of modern authors and playwrights. There was a disposition of the artists last night and the night before not to speak loud enough to be heard in the back rows of the Metropolitan. When speaking the lines of Shakespeare, we cannot afford to lose the exact words of the author. A little more exertion on the part of the leading artists would have been much more satisfactory to the audience. Miss Wainwright is one of the greatest Shakespearean actresses on the stage. In "Viola," however, she does not make the slightest attempt to assume a masculine character—does not even dispense with corsets. But no matter, she captures us withal, and makes a charming success of her intended deception. The "Olivia" of Miss Walsh is an excellent conception, in manner, voice, and dress? The "Sir Toby" of William F. Owen, is a masterpiece of art. If he had lived in the bard's day, he would doubtless have been his ideal. Barton Hill made a fine "Malvolio," the best on the stage with the exception of Henry Irving. Percy Crooks made a fair "Aguecheek." The company was much above the average in support. To-night the famous four-act comedy of The Honeymoon, by John Tobin, will be produced. The last time this sparkling comedy was presented in this city, it was by Margaret Mather. It is certain that Mr. Owen will do full justice to the "Mock Duke."

Buchanan on Ballot Reform.

On the 22d November, 1858, Mr. James Buchanan, President of the United States, wrote from the White House to Pittsburg, Pa., in response to an invitation to attend the celebration of the completion of a century since that place was founded, a letter of lamentation over the degeneracy of the times, the gathering perils of disunion, the prospect of a recourse to despotism as a safeguard from anarchy and corruption, etc., in which he says:

"I shall assume the privilege of advancing years in referring to another growing and dangerous evil. In the last age, although our fathers, like ourselves, were divided into political parties which often had severe conflicts with each other, yet we never heard, until within a recent period, of the employment of money to carry elections. Should this practice increase until the voters and their representatives in the State and National Legislatures shall become infected, the fountain of free government will then be poisoned at its source, and we must end, as history proves, in a military despotism. A democratic republic, all agree, cannot long survive unless sustained by public virtue. When this is corrupted and the people become venal, there is a canker at the root of the tree of liberty, which must cause it to wither and to die."

Prince Bismarck is in appearance now a very feeble old man. His face is waxen and flabby, and his hands are yellow and swollen in the joints, and marked with unnaturally big blue veins. He is becoming very stout, and is no longer able to walk much, but still has a wonderful capacity for tobacco. He has been called a keller-raucher, or "chain-smoker"—that is, a smoker who unites dinner to breakfast with an endless chain of cigars, lighting a fresh one as soon as the one before it has burned to a stump.

There was a young man lived in Yolo

Who thought he had talent to sing,

He made his debut in a solo,

And attempted a foolhardy thing;

His listeners all grew so looney,

That the singer he hunted a cranny;

He sang of a maiden called Rooney,

Whom we commonly speak of as Annie.

Sacramento is having a boom in stoue sidewalks. It is cheaper than wood, and lasts much longer.

"Sconchin" Maloney says if De Young is elected Senator that he ("Sconchin") will leave the State. Estee's friends are alarmed; they are afraid if this statement becomes circulated that there will be a stampede to De Young.

Oranges are almost a drug on the market. They are peddled about the city, and a very fair article sold for ten cents per dozen. The finest seedless and navels, beautiful in color and ten inches in circumference, bring only forty cents.

The electric railway is undoubtedly the best thing for the prosperity and advancement of this city that has been constructed for years. It travels with a greater speed than a good roadster, and when you start for some place you "get there" on time. Last Sunday they collected 14,000 fares. The horse car is a thing of the past.

Next week THEMIS will commence a series of articles on the Pioneer Women of America. They are being compiled by one of the Daughters of the Golden West, and will be very entertaining. The first of the series will be the life and character of Mrs. Daniel Boone, the first white woman to emigrate to what is now the State of Kentucky.

"Tell me not of your doubts and discouragements," says Goethe, "I have plenty of my own. But talk to me of your hope and faith." The tone of complaint is one which we are all too ready to accept, and which is not only injurious to ourselves but hurtful to all who come in contact with us. In speaking of a young woman who has filled several good positions with no degree of success, an elderly woman said: "She could have kept either position and earned a good income if she had not been so dissatisfied, she was continually finding fault and never felt that she was appreciated." It may be safely said that this attitude of mind is one that almost pre-determines failure in any line of work. Patience under adverse circumstances will often bring about favorable results, while complaint only accentuates and fixes the cause of complaint. Avoid mention of the disagreeable things that may come into your life. If you cannot be patient you can at least be silent. The secret of success lies not so much in knowing what to say, as in what to avoid saying. Next to finding fault with your own circumstances avoid criticizing other people. The habit of criticizing one's friends and acquaintances is one that often mars much that would otherwise be pleasant and helpful in social life. Do not discuss the peculiarities of your friends. It is "bad form" to say the least, and is needless and unnecessary.

James, James, I thought you said you would never take another drink as long as you lived. James—So I did, dearest, but I have been chewing too much tobacco. Wife—Yes; what kind of tobacco did you use. Husband—Piper-Heidseck.

Why Wrightman Wouldn't Fight a Duel.

A half dozen young men were dining in a private room. The dinner was almost finished; the coffee and cigarettes had been served. One of the diners was tall and well formed. Another was under medium size. In taking his cigarette from his mouth, the smaller man upset his coffee, apparently by accident. The coffee ran across the table and dripped on the knee of the taller man. He looked up and said: "You're awkward!" "Awkward is an 'awkward' expression," replied the smaller man, after a brief silence, during which both stared steadily at each other. "Make it d--d awkward, then!" said the tall man. His vis-a-vis made no reply. He seized a glass half filled with wine and dashed its contents into the tall man's face. The diners sprang to their feet. The tall man uttered an oath and reached across the table. But he was drawn back. He composed himself with surprising quickness, and turning to one of the party, said, "I'll kill that fellow for this, Bob. You arrange a meeting, will you?" Bob went 'round the table to the small man. "Wrightman," he said, "I'm sorry. But will you refer me to some one?" "No," answered Wrightman, "I will refer you to no one. I will not fight a duel." He made the announcement firmly. Expressions of surprise uttered by the men at the table had no apparent effect upon him. The tall man laughed and asked with a sneer, "Why? Are you afraid?" Wrightman's face flushed, but he replied steadily: "I will not fight a duel." "Why not?" asked the tall man's second. "You don't suppose, do you, that Thorne here, can allow you to throw wine in his face without calling you to account?" "My reasons for refusing to fight a duel," said Wrightman, "are my own. I will not tell what they are. But I will propose to you that your friend and I and one other man, yourself, if you please, go to my apartments. Your friend and I will fight with our fists until one or the other gives up." There were exclamations of amazement at this. "Oh, that's absurd, I'm not an animal," said Thorne. All protested that such a contest would be brutal. But the objections did not alter Wrightman. "Brutal it may be," he said, "but it's the only sort of meeting I'll consent to. I won't fight a duel. If Mr. Thorne's nose bleeds easily, he had better let the matter drop." "I'll consent," said Thorne quickly, "Let it be a prize fight." The party left the café in solemn silence, the waiters looking at them with much curiosity. Two of the diners fell behind their comrades. "This is a very queer affair," said one, "Wrightman's upsetting that coffee was an ordinary accident." "There is undoubtedly something back of all this," answered the other. "But what could have been Wrightman's reason for refusing to fight a duel? Duels are not common, but I'd hate to decline a challenge." "I know. He told me once that his father, who was a Southerner, killed a man in a duel. Years afterwards he learned that his opponent was entirely innocent of the wrongs of which he had suspected him, and the knowledge affected him deeply. He opposed duelling bitterly thereafter and made his son promise to never tender or accept a challenge." "I'm afraid Thorne is too big for him." "Perhaps. But Wrightman will never know when he's whipped." It was midnight when the young men halted before a big bachelor apartment-house on one of the residence avenues. The principals and the referee simply said good night to the others and entered the house. Wrightman's man opened his door for him. "Take the chairs and the table out of that room," said Wrightman, pointing to a small inside apartment, "and then you may go." When he had gone Wrightman and Thorne stripped to the waist. No word was spoken for some moments. Then Bob, as referee, asked if the matter couldn't be settled. "No," said Thorne "it can't. We'll have it out now," and Wrightman nodded. There were to be no rounds. They were to fight as long as they could. This decision made the referee a useless officer. But he stayed. Neither man was in condition for prolonged exertion. Both belonged to the same great athletic club, but when they went to the gymnasium, intending to put themselves through a course of training, they donned athletic costumes, dropped into easy chairs and spent the time drinking. But they both sparred well. They went at each other, viciously in earnest. They fought hard and fast, at close range, and both men were soon exhausted. By mutual consent, hostilities were suspended. Then they were energetically resumed. Wrightman's eyes were rapidly closing, and Thorne's lip was swelling and bleeding. Wrightman had held his own very well against his heavier antagonist. He had industriously punched Thorne in the stomach.

The referee suggested that the fight had gone far enough. Wrightman's answer was to jump at Thorne, hit him luckily and knock him down. Thorne rose quickly and the battle raged fiercely. By an awkward blow which struck Wrightman on the head, Thorne's right wrist was broken. He backed away. The fracture was painful. Wrightman rushed at him then and happened to hit him on the neck. The blow settled Thorne. He sank to his knees, sighed gently, and collapsed. The fight was over. Wrightman wavered unsteadily for a moment. Thorne "came 'round" in five minutes. He was put in one of Wrightman's beds and Wrightman retired to an adjoining room. He sent the referee for a physician friend. When they were alone, Wrightman went to Thorne. "Shake hands," he said. Thorne took the outstretched hand. He asked: "Where is she now?" "In San Francisco with a gambler," answered Wrightman. "Umph! A couple of idiots," said Thorne. "We were," responded Wrightman.—N. Y. NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of Edwin C. Barclay, an insolvent debtor. Edwin C. Barclay having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said Edwin C. Barclay is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the county of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said Edwin C. Barclay, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the county of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court room of said Court, on the 10th day of April, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M., of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in the county of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. Dated, February 25th, 1891. A. P. CATLIN, Judge of the Superior Court. FRANK D. RYAN, Attorney for Petitioner. f25-6t

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to DAVID KIZER, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 29th day of January, 1891, in which action, Annie Kizer is plaintiff, and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of said Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between plaintiff and defendant on the grounds of desertion and failure to provide; also, for the care, custody and control of the minor children, the issue of said marriage, viz: Nettie and Edna, aged 5 years, and 15 months respectively, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made; and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and, within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL.] and affix the seal of said Court, this 29th day of January A. D. 1891.
W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.
By J. F. Doody, Deputy Clerk.
W. A. GETT, Jr., Attorney for Plaintiff. ja31-9t

A Strange Story.

Early in January of the present year, a woodman engaged in chopping some of the monster oaks in the northern part of the great "Black Forest," Germany, and who had built a fire against a large dead log preparatory to partaking of his midday meal, was surprised to see a serpent of gigantic proportions crawl from the log as soon as the rotten wood had got well warmed through. The day was bitter cold and the snake only made a few yards over the frozen ground until his convolutions became smaller and smaller, until he finally ceased to wriggle and quietly coiled up near a large pile of brush. The sturdy German chopper, who had been more surprised than scared, waited until the creature had become thoroughly benumbed with the cold and then approached and dispatched him with his axe. Measurements showed the slimy creature to be twenty-seven feet six inches in length and nearly fifteen inches through the body in the middle. But the most curious part of the story is yet to be told: Just back of the immense head, which was eleven inches in length and almost as broad, a little gold ring had been put through the skin. It was in the form of two rings rather than one, being shaped not unlike a figure eight. One part of the ring was through the skin while the other was through a hole in a small copper coin bearing date of 1712. One side of the coin was perfectly smooth, with the exception of these letters and figures, which had evidently been cut on it with a pocket-knife, the workmanship being very rough: "Louis Krutzer B. G. O., 1781." Some of the older inhabitants of the "Black Forest" remember hearing their parents tell of "Krutzer, the serpent charmer," and they all unite in declaring that this gigantic serpent was formerly the property of the old "charmer," and that it was at least 115 years old when killed by the woodchopper on that cold January day of 1891.

History of English Rule.

First William the Norman, then William his son, Henry, Stephen and Henry, then Richard and John, Henry the Third, Edwards one, two, and three, And again after Richard three Henrys we see, Fourth Edward, third Richard, if rightly I guess, Two Henrys, sixth Edward, Queens Mary and Bess, Then Jamie the Scotchman, then Charles whom they slew, And again after Cromwell another Charles Two; Next James the Second ascended the throne, Then William and Mary together came on, After Anne, Georges four and King William had passed God sent us Victoria. May she long be the last!

The above is somewhat ancient, but it is good. Some historical poetic sharp should adapt the same style for our Presidents.

WHICH WILL IT BE?

Which is the fairest, a rose or a lily?
Which is the sweetest, a peach or a pear?
Merry's coquettish, and charming is Milly;
Dora is gentle and fair.
Sweet as a flower was her face when I kissed [her].
Milly, my laymate, I love "like a sister,"
But Dora I choose for my wife.

That is right, young man, marry the girl you love, by all means, if she will have you. Should her health become delicate and her beauty fade after marriage, remember that this is usually due to functional disturbances, weaknesses, irregularities, or painful disorders peculiar to her sex, in the cure of which Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or money refunded. See the printed certificate of guarantee on bottle-wrapper.

For overworked, "worn-out," "run-down," debilitated teachers, milliners, dressmakers, seamstresses, "shop-girls," housekeepers, nursing mothers, and feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the greatest earthly boon, being unequalled as an appetizing cordial and restorative tonic, or strength-giver.

Napoleon's Dog.

It was dark, and down a retired street in Paris a man rode alone on horseback, says the Youth's Companion. Suddenly the horse stopped as if frightened. Then a man rose from the pavement in the middle of the street and jumped to one side with a cry. The rider was angry and exclaimed: "Are you drunk, man, that you lie about in the middle of a dark street to get yourself run over?"

"You might better lend a poor fellow a hand than scold in that way," exclaimed the other. "I had 300 francs in gold in this bag, carrying it to pay a bill for my master, and the bag has broken and it is all lost over the street. If you have some matches they will do me more good than your curses."

"It's no easy task to find lost money on a night like this," said the rider, dismounting. "I have no matches, but perhaps I can help you. Have you any of the pieces left?"

"Only one," replied the unfortunate fellow, with a sob.

"Give it to me," said the other.

The poor man hesitated, but the stranger repeated the words in a tone of authority, and the last coin was handed to him.

The stranger whistled and a great Spanish mastiff stood beside him. He held the coin to the dog's nose, and leaning to the rough pavement said: "Find them."

The dog sniffed the gold piece and began the search.

One, two, three; he began bringing in the coins and dropping them into his master's hand, while the poor servant stood by in silent wonder.

Thirteen times he returned with a 20-franc piece. Then, after a long search, he came back empty, with a grunt that seemed to say: "There are no more."

"We are yet lacking one piece," said the stranger. "Are you sure there were just 300 francs?"

"Sure as sure can be, sir," the servant replied.

"Then look in the bag again. There must be one left there."

The man looked and sure enough found the last gold piece there.

"Oh, sir!" he exclaimed, as the stranger sprang into his saddle, "you are my deliverer. Tell me your name that my master may know who has done him such a service."

"I have done nothing," said the stranger. "Tell your master that the one who helped you was a very good and intelligent dog by the name of Joie."

It was some years afterward, when France had seen troubled times and the royal family was no more, that the master was telling the incident to a party of friends, one of whom had been employed in the palace.

"Joie! Joie!" he exclaimed. "There never was but one dog of that name and there never was a more remarkable and faithful dog than he. He always accompanied his master when he went in disguise about the city."

"Who was his master?" they all asked.

The reply was brief: "The Emperor Napoleon."

Retrospective.

"George, dear, I don't see how you ever found courage to ask me to be your wife."

"It was a pretty hard thing for me to do, wasn't it? Did I make a fool of myself, Nellie?"

The young man shifted her weight on the other knee as he asked the question.

"Not any more than usual, George. You always acted confused and bashful, you know."

"M—yes, I suppose I was a good deal of a dunderhead," candidly admitted the youth; "but I was pretty far gone," he added in extenuation. "I was hooked in both gills."

"Now confess, George," said the maiden, toying with his watch chain, "didn't your heart fly right up into your throat when you—when you asked me the—the question, you know?"

"It tried to, Nellie," replied George, shifting her weight again, but your head, you remember, was kind o' holding it down."

And Nellie didn't say anything more for a long, long time.—Chicago Tribune.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
J. H. MILLER, Managing Editor.

We esteem that from the standpoint of Americans there can be but one view taken of the tragedy that occurred in New Orleans on Saturday. It concerns little if the victims were citizens of the United States, native or naturalized, or if they were foreigners unnaturalized. Upon the soil of the United States it has been proved, and doubtless will continue to be proved, there is no foothold for lawlessness against our established system of government and the administration of the laws. Particularly can it be expected that stern vengeance will be visited upon those who band together in secret in antagonism to our popular government. Anarchy, and such organizations as the Mafia association, have no place with us; that those concerned in assassination and governmental disruption meet with violent ends creates nothing of sympathy. There has been an endeavor to characterize the proceedings at New Orleans as an attack upon the members of a particular nationality—the Italians—and a portion of the Italian press has been disposed to so regard it. There is, however, nothing in that; and we cannot conceive why intelligent men, of foreign or American birth, should for a moment degrade their manhood by defending criminals for the reason, simply, that they happen to have been born in the country of their nativity. Certain it is, if a band of Americans were to organize in Italy, or any other foreign country, for unlawful purposes, they would receive little sympathy if the severest of punishment were visited upon them—perhaps less sympathy than if they committed similar acts at home, for if they are not satisfied with the system of government abroad their business would have been to have stayed at home. The situation of New Orleans is peculiar, in that its geographical position and its early population attracts to it an element undesirable. The very fact that a secret society exists there that has gone to the extremity of shooting down upon the public streets the Chief of Police, that thereafter a jury was impaneled so weak as to acquit in some cases and to disagree in others, was sufficient to justify a resort to popular retribution. There can be no justification for mob violence save in extraordinary cases; it is a dangerous expedient, particularly in this age, where the courts are presumed to be effective to punish crime. In countries with newly established governments, and peopled by adventurous classes, it has been a necessity. In California, twice, in the metropolis, the Committee of Vigilance held full sway—in 1851 and in 1856. Men were hanged, some banished; the city was purged of the undesirable element. In a lesser degree in the early days was the power of the people demonstrated in Sacramento and other interior cities. The effects were salutary, and for a time following each outbreak of popular indignation, security to person and property was assured. The visitations of punishment were upon people of American birth, mostly. Conspicuous among the victims were James P. Casey, who shot and killed the editor of the San Francisco Bulletin, and Charles Cora, who had killed the United States Marshal.

The time for the selection of a police force for the city is approaching. We believe the present Board of Police Commissioners will view differently the matter of the organization and selection of the force than have some of their predecessors. The Act of March 6, 1872, establishing a Police Department is very explicit. It contemplates, in language that cannot be misunderstood, that the police force shall be permanent, and that no policeman shall be removed except on written charges and after a public trial and conviction by the Commissioners. There is a provision that in addition to the usual oath of office the Commissioners shall take the further oath: "That in every appointment or removal to be by them made, to or from the police force created and to be organized by them under this Act, they will in no case and under no pretext, appoint or remove any policeman for or on account of the political opinion of such policeman, or for any other cause or reason than the fitness or unfitness of such person, in the best judgment of said Commissioners, for the place to which he shall be appointed, or from which he shall be removed." All that the people desire is a strict observance of the law, and in our judgment it would be a matter of wisdom if the Commissioners would disregard politics, select men with regard to their fitness only, and appoint them permanently. The annual scrambles for positions on the police force have resulted in demoralization, and it has been that men with good records have been displaced without cause. It is manifest from the temper of the people that there is a disposition to bring about a more efficient and modernized system of government, and to weed out the evils consequent upon the domination of political powers over our municipal government. We have confidence that the Board of Police Commissioners will be in earnest; that their endeavor will be to act with wisdom and discretion, and we feel that from the circumstances surrounding the selection of each of them, they will act with entire independence, except so far as the interests of the city will be consulted. An officer with a good record should be retained; if in the judgment of the Commissioners new men should be appointed, let the appointments be discreetly made, and when the force is selected let there be the guarantee to its members that they will remain undisturbed so long as they perform faithful and efficient service. In this way only can we obtain a force that will properly attend to the public service; its members will not be constantly cowed by those who assume to possess political influence.

Gertrude Atherton made a very bold statement when she wrote, "a virtuous woman has no respect for a virtuous man." It is very severe on her sex, but in a somewhat modified form there is much truth in the sentiment. A woman full of life and ambition will take more kindly to the dashing reprobate than to the quiet, temperate, good young man. This does not detract from her virtue, however, but is the natural impulse of woman. We can observe this illustrated in all our social relations. The bold, rollicking fellow can at all times secure the attention and favor of the girls, while the sedate, modest, good young man remains a wall flower, the admiration of aged spinsters. But on the contrary, the wild and reckless man has the deepest veneration for the modest, virtuous woman. A true woman never admires an empty-headed dandy; and while she likes the dash and vim of the brilliant, though mayhap dissolute fellow, she still looks up to the man of brains and learning. A lady writer in the New York World thus takes Gertrude to task for her assault on women's lack of modesty: "Granting there is much immodesty in these days—immodesty in dress, manners, conversation, the drama, and in literature—does it follow that you should ruthlessly arraign your sex as a race of indecent beings, denuding themselves before mankind, and thriving on the lascivious homage of roués and fools?" Gertrude Atherton, being the authoress of one of the most erotic novels in print, is not a fair judge of women's modesty.

Speaking of a new society organized in Boston, called the Anti-Superfluity Society, the New York World humorously urges that this is directed against the superfluity of women in Massachusetts: "A careful reading of their programme of purposes indicates that the 'thralldom' from which they seek release, is that of women. For two or three generations now the 'superfluous women' of Massachusetts have been a source of perplexity and apprehension in that State. These men say they 'propose to fight the campaign on the plain principle that the individual [mark the term as not inclusive of the individual's wife] is happier, more comfortable, and in every way better off without the superfluities than with them.' Now, what can 'the superfluities' mean, in such connection and in Massachusetts mouths, but women? Again, they describe 'the superfluities' as 'tyrannical luxuries,' which is precisely what the misogynist soul holds women preëminently to be. They speak of 'thralldom,' too, which means, of course, that most of them are rebellious married men, weary of being told that they must wipe their feet, and denied the use of a latch-key, and closely questioned as to their personal expenditures, and all the rest of it. Finally, they protest especially against the thralldom of 'respectability.' As sure as back hair grows, those fellows are up to mischief. They want to drink beer and eat Welsh rabbits late at night, and smoke in bed, and swear when they lose their collar buttons, and do all those other delightfully unconventional things which women and respectability combine to forbid; and as a first step they have set themselves to abolish 'the superfluities,' meaning thereby the good women of Massachusetts."

The amicable relations which have so long existed between this country and Great Britain are likely to be interrupted in the near future. In fact, we see no honorable way of avoiding war with the English nation. It is reported that General Lord Wolseley, or Lord General Wolseley, as one may choose to call him, is coming over to British Columbia with the intention of staying there until the Behring sea question is settled, and if that dispute be not adjusted to his entire satisfaction, he intends to declare war against us. It is reported that he has sealed orders to that effect. It is further reported that another English General, who is not a lord, is coming to Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, on a like mission. This General, who is not a Lord, is commissioned to attack us all along the Atlantic seaboard in case the controversy about codfish be not brought to a satisfactory settlement in a short time. No reliance should be placed on these rumors, so far, at least, as the causes which are to bring these military gentlemen to the western side of the Atlantic ocean are concerned. It may be that General Lord Wolseley, and the other military person will come over, but it will not be on the fur seal or the codfish business. Those disputes are moving rapidly to the point of adjustment. Lord Salisbury has just submitted a proposal to arbitrate the fur seal question, and it is understood that Secretary Blaine and Sir Julian Pauncefote have about come to an agreement as to how the codfish shall be divided. It is stated that Old England will get one codfish out of every five, and that New England will get the remainder—at least, Blaine thinks that this would be an equitable division. We are not positive that this arrangement will be ratified, but we do know that under no circumstances will England be allowed more than two codfish out of every seven.

Neither the codfish dispute nor the Behring sea question will have anything to do with the war that will arise between this country and England. What English women have said about American girls will be the true cause of hostilities. Marriageable English women have said ugly things about our girls, and have proclaimed a boycott against them, and this is why General Lord Wolsley, and the other General, who is not a lord, are coming to the American side of the Atlantic ocean. They are in "cohoots" with the English women, and want to get and underhold on us. The English women say that our girls have no right to marry English husbands—that they are intruders when they do so. They say that the American girl is scrawny; that she fades early; doesn't make a good wife, and that she is cold-blooded. So, they have proclaimed a boycott against her. Here is a cause of war, for a fact, as English women will find out to their sorrow. A few American girls are lank, but the most of them are as plump as any English woman. They may fade a little prematurely; that is, some of them may, but they are just glorious while they last. But these are minor matters, and have nothing to do with the true cause of the war that is sure to come. The English women have stated that the American girl is a cold-blooded animal, and if this doesn't call for war, we have misinterpreted the nature of the American girl, and the nature of the Native Daughter of the Golden West in particular.

The American men are not going into the war except to look out for General Lord Wolsley and the other General, who is not a lord. If they misbehave in the least, or attempt any underhand work, the men will attend to their cases. In all other respects the war will be conducted from a female base. And won't the fur—we mean words—won't the words fly? The American girl is a better hand with the pen than her English sister, and when she squares herself for work, the boycotters across the water will think her a red-hot furnace. There is fun ahead, and no mistake. The American girl will soon be to the fore, when statesman Blaine and Lord Salisbury may learn a lesson in diplomacy greatly to their enlightenment.

Now then. THEMIS' wishes to lift up her voice, and make a few remarks: Democratic Senator Seawell, of Mendocino county, nominated Assemblyman Shannahan for the office of Federal Senator the other day. There was nothing improper in this, for one may nominate another person for Senator, whether the other person gets any votes or not. But Senator Seawell made a speech, in doing which, he said certain things which mark him as an unsafe statesman. The Mendocino legislator allowed his tongue to run a mile or two ahead of his judgment, and if there are any more nominating speeches to be made, the Democratic leaders would do well to assign the duty of making them to some one else. Senator Seawell opened his discourse by stating that the Democrats have a majority of 130 in the Congress which was elected last November, and that everything tends to show that the party will have full control of all the departments of the government in a short time. A good deal of this is prophecy, and inasmuch as the country has not produced but one real seer since Daniel Webster died, namely: Charles Sumner, we will be pardoned if we do not give it serious attention. One ought, however, to be able by this time to state with reasonable accuracy the political composition of the House of Representatives of the fifty-second Congress. Clerk McPherson, of the House, has sent out a list of the members, from which it appears that there are 87 Republicans, 236 Democrats, 8 Farmer's Alliance men, with the Second Rhode Island District to be filled. Thus, it appears, counting the Rhode Island man against them, the Democrats have a clear majority of 136. This is so dangerous a majority, that the Democratic party may well look forward to the results of the next two sessions of Congress with grave apprehension. But this is not the matter that we set out to write about, still it is a matter that statesman Seawell should consider thoroughly before he takes upon himself the responsibilities of a prophet. The feature of Senator Seawell's address which should receive special attention is this: Taking it for granted that the Democrats will get control of all the departments of the government in a short time, he insists that if we expect to get anything in the way of appropriations for coast defenses, navy yards, public buildings, and the like, we must send a Senator to Washington who will be in harmony with the dominant party. "Send Shannahan," exclaims statesman Seawell, "and we can claim the treasury as our own." What new doctrine is this? Since when has it become the policy of any party to make the granting of appropriations of money for public purposes a matter of favor? The largest single appropriation that was made for any locality by the last Congress, was for Galveston, Texas, to create a deep ship channel in the harbor. Assemblyman Shannahan is a person of clever abilities, and, if we should send him to Washington, he would probably do as little harm as any Democrat that we might send. But how is it that Democratic leaders have changed their views as to the need or policy of spending the public money? Statesman Seawell seems to think that we actually need forts to defend our seaports, and navy yards, or at least one for the construction and repair of war ships, and suitable buildings wherein to transact the public business. How long has Senator Seawell been of this mind? As long as there was a Republican majority in the lower House of Congress, if a person talked about fortifying exposed cities, or the need of navy yards or public buildings, he was rebuked by a multitude of seven-league mouths as being a treasury looter. Now, however, seeing that they will have it all their own way in the House, the Democrats want to loot a little themselves.

MARINE DISASTERS.

Loss of the Steamer Pearl near the City of Sacramento.

PART II.

One of the most frightful calamities that ever occurred on the inland waters of this State, was the explosion of the river steamer Pearl, about one o'clock, on Saturday, January 27th, 1891. The high pressure steamer Pearl, Davis, Master, left Marysville at 7 o'clock, with an unusual crowd of passengers, numbering as nearly as could be ascertained about 130, of whom 35 were Chinamen.

The steamer had almost reached Sacramento, and was just below the mouth of the American river, when an explosion occurred which lifted the forward deck, and threw it directly over the bows. Fifty or sixty lives were lost by this dreadful disaster—nearly a dozen were blown into the air, and one or two to a height of sixty or seventy feet, and nearly to the opposite shore of the Sacramento.

The wheel-house was blown overboard, and the pilot wheel broken into five or six pieces, but strange to say, the pilot was not killed, although considerably injured. The upper deck was blown completely off, and the passengers clung in crowds to it, as the confused mass floated down the river. Immediately after the explosion every available boat along the river was brought into requisition and many lives saved. The steamer Yolo, a small ferry boat, also rendered valuable assistance. The Pearl was a new boat, having been in service but nine months, and was a general favorite with the traveling public.

In an editorial, on Monday, January 29th, the Sacramento Union says: Yesterday was a solemn Sabbath in Sacramento. Its counterpart has not been witnessed since the city had an existence—God grant that we may never again be a participant in the mournful scenes through which we have just passed. The hours of holy time were ushered in calm and peaceful. The sun dawned bright and beautiful on this valley, and his genial rays were cast upon the silvery bosom of the Sacramento, whose waters were as tranquil as an infant's sleep. At that early morning hour, naught was there save the shattered wreck moored to the shore, to indicate that but a brief period before fifty immortal souls were instantly summoned to their Maker's presence. The engulfing waters were at rest, although many of the victims of the dire catastrophe slumbered in the river's bed.

The day had far advanced, however, ere there were unmistakable tokens of the dreadful disaster. Processions of pedestrians poured down our thoroughfares toward the levee, wending their way to the scene of the accident. Numerous boats, manned by strong arms and provided with grapnels, pushed from the shore and repaired to the spot where the ill-fated Pearl had exploded. The banks of the Sacramento and American were covered with men, women and children, sadly and silently watching the boatmen in their mournful search, or conversing in groups almost inaudibly about the terrible calamity. The flags on the various boats and public buildings drooped sullenly at half mast, and every thing save the bright sun wore an aspect of gloom.

By and by the bodies of the dead began to be discovered, and at little intervals were drawn to the surface on the hooks of the diligent boatmen. All day long were they thus employed, and the friends of the deceased have the satisfaction of knowing that to their exertions are they in a great measure indebted for the recovery of the remains, which otherwise probably would never have been restored to them.

The Sabbath waned, and yet the solemn labors of the surgeon, the undertaker and the searcher went on. The station house was transferred into a morgue; and throughout the day, sorrowful faces might have been seen bending over the disfigured corpses, to trace, if possible, the lineaments of the countenance of their friends.

The coffin maker, the grave digger, and the hearse driver were busy. There were many dead bodies to be entombed, and the services of these must be put in requisition. From the station house, from the hospital and from the private dwelling did the solemn cortege move to the city of the dead.

At three o'clock the bodies of Col. Anderson, Capt. Davis and Capt. Randall were borne to their last resting place. The coffins containing their mortal remains were placed side by side in a grave provided by a friend. Their countenances were exposed, and with the exception of that of the commander of the lost boat, appeared as life-like and natural as if they were but in temporary repose. The procession was a long one, and as it wound slowly to the place of sepulture, sadness was depicted in every face. The funeral rites at the grave were exceedingly affecting. Rev. Mr. Benton officiated, first reading appropriate scriptural selections, and concluding by offering up a prayer, in which he alluded particularly to the persons of the deceased, and the domestic relations of each. A single relative only was present of any of the dead—a striking evidence, truly, that they had indeed died far from home and the scenes of their earlier years.

But the appalling tragedy was not ended with the interment of these. As the somber shades of evening fell upon the city, the tidings that another, and another, and still another of the victims of the Pearl had been found were quickly borne throughout the city. Upward of forty dead bodies have been recovered, and it is estimated that fully twenty more sleep on the bottom of the river.

In the annals of California disasters there is none comparable to that which now shrouds this entire community in sorrow. Fires and floods we have experienced, but these have ruined property only, and the losses are by no means irreparable. Accidents similar to the misfortune which now afflicts this people have occurred within our borders, but never attended with the horrible results of this. The explosions of the Secretary, Jenny Lind, American Eagle, Page, Ranger, Sagamore and San Joaquin were indeed deplorable, but not so awful as that we mourn to-day.

The darkest day in the history of California inland navigation, we sincerely hope, has passed. A recurrence of the scenes of the Sabbath and preceding day is, we trust, never to be witnessed by either ourselves or those who are to come after us.

On Monday, January 29th, twenty-nine bodies were taken to the city cemetery. The procession consisted of over 3,000 persons, and was made up as follows:

- Grand Marshal and Aids.
- Music.
- Sacramento Pioneer Association.
- Five hearses.
- Citizens in carriages.
- The Mayor, Common Council, and City Officers.
- Governor and State Officers.
- Senate and Assembly.
- Chief and Assistant Engineers of the Fire Department.
- Knickerbocker Engine Co. No. 5.
- Eureka Engine Co. No. 4.
- Sacramento Engine Co. No. 3.
- Protection Engine Co. No. 2.
- Alert Hook and Ladder Co. No. 2.
- Mutual Hook and Ladder Co. No. 1.
- Confidence Engine Co. No. 1.
- Hebrew Benevolent Society.
- Golden Horizon Temple of Honor No. 1.
- Temperance Organizations.
- Odd Fellows.
- Masonic Fraternity.
- Citizens in carriages.
- Draymen mounted.
- Chinese Marshal.
- Eight hearses.
- Chinese in carriages.
- Chinese music.
- Chinese in wagons.
- Chinese mounted.
- Chinese on foot with scarf on left arm.

It was a rare sight, and at once flattering to the liberality of our institutions, to see there assembled on common ground, the Christian and the Pagan, each acknowledging the sacred character of the departed, and manifesting, according to their peculiar tenets, respect for their memory and worth. This unusual circumstance, together with the large number of new-made graves and coffined bodies, and the immense crowd of persons in attendance, contributed to render the occasion one of sad and singular interest.

PIONEER WOMEN.

Brief Sketches Written by a Daughter of the Golden West.

PART I.

"Men's dire deserts each reader may recite,
For men of men do make a goodly show;
But women's works can seldom come to light,
No mortal man their famous acts may know;
Few writers will a little time bestow,
The worthy acts of women to repeat,
Though their renown and the deserts be great."

The poet's complaint might be made with peculiar justice in the case of American women who followed the earliest adventurers into the unknown forests of the West. One of their own number often said: "A good Providence sent such men and women into the world together. They were made to match."

Such a race will probably never again live in this country. The progress of improvement, art, and luxury has a tendency to change the female character, so that even a return of the perils of war or the necessity for exertion would hardly develop in it the strength which belonged to the matrons who nursed the infancy of the republic.

They were formed by early training in habits of energetic industry, and familiarity with privation and danger, to take their part in subduing the wilderness for the advance of civilization. Though their descendants cannot emulate their heroic deeds, it will be a pleasing task to call up recollections of them; to observe their patient endurance of hardships, and to compare their homely but honest exterior with the accomplishment and graces of the sex in modern days.

In the rural cemetery near Frankfort, upon a hill overlooking the river, under the shadow of protecting trees, are two green mounds, unmarked by slab or stone informing the stranger that the remains of two honored pioneers—Daniel Boone and his wife—rest beneath. Mrs. Boone's maiden name was Rebecca Bryan. Her father was one of the pioneers of North Carolina and had his home in the midst of a forest on the borders of the Yadkin, at no great distance from the eastern slope of the Alleghanies, then a frontier country, and the greater part of it unbroken forest. Boone met Miss Bryan at her home and was introduced to her by her father. Daniel was twenty and Rebecca sixteen. Both were young, beautiful, and at the period when the affections exercise their most energetic influence. All reasonable time and space were granted to the claims of maidenly modesty. As for Boone, he was remarkable for the backwood attribute of never being beaten out of his track, and he ceased not to woo until he gained the heart of Rebecca Bryan. In a word, he courted her successfully, and they were married.

Boone's first step after marriage was to find a suitable place where he might cultivate his farm, and hunt to the greatest advantage. His wife remained at home while he went to explore the unsettled regions of North Carolina. When he had selected a locality near the headwaters of the Yadkin, Rebecca, with the same resolute spirit of enterprise which afterwards led her to the wilds of Kentucky, bade farewell to her friends, and followed her adventurous husband. In a few months her home had assumed a pleasant aspect; a neat cabin stood on a pleasant eminence near the river, surrounded by an enclosed field; the farm was well stocked, and with the abundance of game in the woods, the settlers had no lack of means for comfort and enjoyment.

The rude dwelling frequently offered the traveler shelter; and by a cheerful fire, and table loaded with the finest game, with the enhancing blessing of a hospitable welcome, was many a tale of adventure narrated, while as yet the surrounding forest was untouched by an axe. For some years the young couple lived in this sylvan retirement, till the fields of other emigrants opened wide clearings, and dwellings rose so thickly in the neighborhood as to form villages; when Boone made up his mind to remove to some wilder spot.

In 1760, a man by the name of Finley struck into the pathless forests, crossed the Cumberland mountains and explored the wilderness. As the wanderer penetrated into what is now Kentucky, the luxuriant beauty of its plains, its rich cane-brakes and flower-covered forests promised every thing desirable in a new home. The forest abounded with deer, elk, and buffaloes, while white pheasants, partridges, wild turkeys, etc., were as plentiful as domestic fowls in a farm yard.

On the first of May, 1769, Daniel Boone, and five other adventurous spirits started on an expedition for Kentucky. They crossed the Alleghany mountains, and explored the valley of the Ohio, where the buffaloes roamed like herds of cattle. Boone and one of his companions, Stewart, were captured by the Indians, but made their escape. Two of the party were killed by the Indians.

Boone, after locating a farm and building a log-cabin, returned across the mountains for his family. He undertook to get up an expedition, but was two years in doing so. The party commenced its march in September, 1773, and were about eighty in number. While passing through a narrow defile, the party was attacked by savages, and six men killed, the stock scattered and considerable of it lost. The party decided to give up the attempt at making a settlement in Kentucky, and returned about forty miles to Church river. It may be supposed that Mrs. Boone, whose eldest son had been slain in the encounter, had lost all spirit for the enterprise, and her husband was obliged to submit to the decision of the rest.

Boone built a fort at Boonesborough, in 1775, and when he finished it, he returned for his family. Mrs. Boone and her daughter were the first white women that ever stood on the banks of the Kentucky river. Mrs. Boone's little daughter, with two other little girls were out gathering flowers on the banks of the river, when they were seized by Indians and carried into captivity. Boone and a party went in pursuit, four of the five Indians were killed, and the little captives returned to their parents.

Daniel Boone was for many months in captivity. He was absent from home so long that his wife gave him up for dead, and went into deep mourning. She took her children and returned to the home of her father in North Carolina. When Boone escaped and returned to Boonesborough he was surprised to learn of his wife's movements. He immediately went to them, and the following spring found them all safe in Kentucky again.

Mrs. Boone died in March, 1813. A most faithful and efficient helpmate had she proved to the pioneer, possessing the same energy, heroism, and firmness which he had shown in all the vicissitudes of his eventful career, with the gentler qualities by which woman, as the center of the domestic system diffuses happiness, and trains her children to become useful and honored in after life. Having shared willingly in the hardships, labors, and dangers of those adventurers whose names live in grateful remembrance, she is entitled to some portion of the renown that has embalmed them.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

"Rounds of applause" help an actor to the top of the ladder of fame.

The latest Chicago comic opera, Maid Marian, is to be translated into German. Then it is sure to be funny.

"English millionaire dudes," according to a recent edict, "have been debarred from the greenrooms of London and French Theatres."

There is now advertised A Parlor Match—with More Sulphur. The stage has to do something to keep up with the ministers' meetings.

Next season Sol Smith Russell will be seen in Mark Twain's Yankee at the Court of King Arthur, which is being dramatized for him by a well-known playwright.

A Missouri weekly paper recently indulged in some critical remarks about Shakespeare, and a farmer named John Shakespeare, thinking the family insulted, came to town and gave the editor a thrashing.

James Owen O'Connor, the gifted tragedian, is said to have joined the medical profession, with the intention, perhaps, to wreak upon the public that terrible "r-revenge-e" which he has so often told us about.

Edith Murilla's singing of the song "I'm a Dashing, Gay Soubrette," is one of the most pleasing features of Ship Ahoy. Miss Murilla also has the reputation of being one of the cleverest dancers on the stage.

Miss Mary Anderson has advertised her stage wardrobe for sale. This confirms the rumor that she intends to retire from professional life. As she is no longer "Our Mary," having jilted Uncle Sam for one John Bull several years ago, she will not be exactly missed, though she will still be mourned on this side of the pond.

The number of girls who promise to succeed Patti is necessarily limited. The names of those mentioned at present are Esther Palliser, a Philadelphia girl; Mary Howe, of Vermont; Emma Eames, of Boston; Emma Nevada, born in Virginia City; Sybil Sanderson, of San Francisco, and Marie Decca, an Ohio girl. Still, as Patti promises to retain her youthfulness as long as Queen Victoria, it is a question hardly worth considering for the next fifty or sixty years.

The Chinese have a myth that the soul of a poet passes into the body of a grasshopper, as the latter sings until it starves.

Lord Tennyson's latest poem contains but nine lines, yet in this brief space it gives promise of being much worse if it had been longer.

Probably the largest price ever paid for a bible, was that put down by J. W. Ellsworth, of Chicago, at the Brayton Ives sale of rare books in progress in New York—$14,800.

Giving a definition of anything is difficult enough, but fixing the exact meaning of such an evanescent and spiritual art as that of poetry is something quite as far beyond human power as is the translation into articulate speech of the inspiration of the stars on a frosty night when their glories are at their best.

Brentanos have just published what is claimed to be a fac simile reproduction of Columbus' log-book kept by him on his first voyage of discovery in 1492. It is said that this log-book has recently been found on the English coast, enclosed in a water-tight casket, together with the royal warrant given to the great navigator by Isabella of Castilla.

The London Times is rejoicing over the triumph of honesty in this country in the passage of an international copyright law. Well, British publishers have been stealing up to this moment. Some of them have grown rich on pirated American works. And there is no evidence that they intend to reform. May our honest example do them some good.

Two of the most singular things I remember about Father Ryan, the "poet priest of the South," whom I knew well when a lad in Mobile, says a Galveston News writer, were his eccentric beliefs on the subject of spiritualism and the location of the human soul. He told me one day that there was no doubt in his mind about the genuineness of certain manifestations of spiritualism, and he cited instances in his own experience. During the same conversation he declared his belief in the old Greek theory that the soul was not inside, but outside the body, covering it with an imperceptible film. Great as his fame as a poet, his genius shone strongest in oratory, of which he was an accomplished master. His death in a hospital at Louisville furnishes a sad commentary on the earthly rewards that wait on famous men.

Requiescat! Let him rest,
Murmuring myrtles o'er his breast—
Let him rest—his journey ended.
Sprinkle the grave and cast the sod
On the child-like priest of God—
Dust with parent dust is blended.

D.: "I attended the jollification at Pierre just after Mr. Kyle's election, and when the boys wanted to take something with him, he said: 'Boys, I can't drink myself, but I will pay for the beer and pull the corks,' and he did."

Squire Kelly, a Pennsylvania Justice, who is wiser than Solomon, juster than Aristides, and a more astute law-giver than Solon, should not be allowed to waste his fragrance on the desert air of the Second Ward of Huntingdon, Pa. His decision in the case of a man who fustigated his wife for flirting with another man, that the wife should return to her usual place of abode and lock the doors so that no strangers can be admitted for a period of six days, that the husband for the same length of time board with his best neighbor and sleep in the barn, and that each party pay half the costs and stand committed until the sentence is complied with, is a classic which should go into the records of jurisprudence with the most learned findings of the country's greatest jurists.

Gen. Hickenlooper, of Ohio, tells a story illustrating Sherman's dry wit, rather at the expense of Gen. Corse. In the fight at Altoona, a rifle-ball took Corse alongside the head, making a slight wound that at the time was thought to be a great deal more dangerous than it really was. When the word reached Sherman it had been greatly magnified and he was informed that Corse's ear and cheek were gone, but that he would still hold his position and fight it out. Meanwhile Corse had tied up his head and gone on with the business he had been sent there to do. As soon as possible Sherman hurried over, full of anxiety as to the damage done his officer. Nothing would do but the bandage must come off, so that he might judge of the damage himself. The surgeons carefully took off the cloths and revealed a slight gash across the face and a hole through the ear. Sherman looked for a moment, and then dryly said: "Why, Corse, they came blank near missing you, didn't they?"

The departing legislator can now exclaim: "Farewell, a long farewell to all my greatness."

The scandals that have been afloat connected with the late senatorial election intensify the arguments in favor of electing United States Senators by a direct vote of the people.

The good, kind soul who wishes to reform something or somebody rarely ever knows how or where to start; and nine times in ten, by unproportioned benevolence, retards the very cause intended to be served.

When you make a mistake, don't look back at it long. Take the reason of the thing into your own mind and then look forward. Mistakes are lessons of wisdom. The past cannot be changed. The future is yet in your power.

If the decision of a Missouri judge, that a rejected lover is entitled to have all his gifts returned, should become the rule of law, then it might be in order to ask what shall be done with the kisses given. An enforcement of the rule to the letter might create an epidemic in kissing.

If you cannot sleep the probability is that it is because your stomach is empty. Get up and eat a cracker or two and drink a glass of milk and go back to bed again; then you will sleep. The rule with all the animal kingdom is to sleep on a full stomach. Man has not yet ceased to be an animal.

Some men have tact in different degrees, while others are wanting in it altogether. It is the outcome of intellectual and of temperamental qualifications, and implies the possession of clear perceptions, quick imagination and delicate sensibilities. It is these that give the tactful person his subtle intuition of another's mental processes and modes of feeling, and in the same moment show exactly the right method of action.

The Danish navigator after whom the Behring sea is called, used the signature "Vitus Bering." Some journalistic purists are willing to admit that he knew how to spell his own name; but the great majority of American papers do not recognize him as an authority. Even the English, who are so in the habit of dropping their h's, adhere to "Behring." Let us hope there will be no controversy over the matter. As the Pull Mall Gazette says, it would be dreadful indeed to have another open question in connection with this much vexed sea.

There is every likelihood that more boycotts will be set on foot against American girls. Seeing that Lawyer Caudert's daughter, Claire, has captured a French count, and that ex-Secretary Bayard's youngest daughter, Nannie, has got a Swedish nobleman on a string, or a hook, or something else, we may look for lively proceedings among the young women of France and Sweden. The American girl has a hard time of it, but she stays at the front just the same. What sort of a thing is a female boycott, any way?

We are so used to hearing Englishmen criticise Americans for their uncouth manners that we don't always realize that something of the same kind might be said of Englishmen. And yet more than thirty-five years ago, when, presumably, the standard of deportment in this country was not as high as it is now, Nathaniel Hawthorne, after a visit to England, said: "I had been struck by the very rough aspect of these John Bulls in their morning garb, their coarse frock coats, gray hats, check trousers and stout shoes; at dinner table it was not at first easy to recognize the same individuals. * * But after awhile you see through all the finery, and become sensible that John Bull cannot make himself fine, whatever he may put on. He is a rough animal and his female is well adapted to him."

The Minnesota Legislature has made it a misdemeanor for an actress to show in tights, and now sober old Massachusetts makes it a misdemeanor to offer or to eat a dinner if the person eating be a member of the Legislature and if the dinner be offered or paid for by any person or corporation having pecuniary interests liable to be affected by legislation. Of the making of misdemeanors there is no end.

It is somewhat strange that the wives of many of the political magnates of both the great parties differ so much in their feelings about their husband's ambition. There is Gen. Russell A. Alger's wife, who is so thoroughly wrapped up in her husband and children that she is strongly opposed to his mingling in public affairs at all. Everybody knows how differently Mrs. John A. Logan felt in the days when her husband was alive, and it is an open secret that Mrs. Cleveland is far more ambitious for another four years at the head of Washington society than her spouse is to go back to the White House routine.

There is no end to new interpretations of old problems. The Bible contains what may be said to be an authoritative account of how Adam and Mother Eve came into the world, but there has never been an authentic and at the same time popular explanation of the origin of "kids." In fact, the common mind is woefully, or, as one might say, marvelously obfuscated on the subject. A Texas poet—long may he live—has put forth the following effort with the view of enlightening the public mind on this singularly obscure proposition:

A winter's day and a muddy street,
A lucky man and a maiden sweet.
She hesitates, he tips his hat—
A bow, a "Thank you," and after that
A call; another; a parson's fee;
A journey; a year; and again we see
A winter's day and a muddy street,
A manly form and a woman sweet—
We see them half in a carriage hid,
He carries a cane, she carries a kid.
—Found Floating.

"I have given up all interest," said an intelligent woman in the Providence Journal, "in the movement for the so-called physical culture of women. It is not that I do not believe most heartily in the full and sympathetic development of the body powers, but the whole cult is being devoted to sensualism. The beauty teachers are devoting themselves, not to wholesome training for health, but to making 'visions of loveliness,' with direct regard to their effect on the other sex, and after as frank methods as could ever have been employed in fitting Circassians for the harem. A woman's first interest in physical culture is to fill out her neck so that she may look better in a décolleté gown. It's all in a line with the manicure business, which is making very ornamental but worse than useless hands. It all goes with our heaps of cushions and shaded lights and refinements of perfumes. It's the development of curves and the study of poses and the absolute deification of dainty sensualism. It would be a good plan to let in on the business a little wholesome sunshine and air.

The Romany Tongue

It is because Gypsies of all lands wherever they go, are Romanies, as they call themselves, and not Frenchmen, or Hungarians, or Englishmen, or Americans, that they have always seemed a mysterious race. They were looked upon in old times as sorcerers and magicians. Many a poor Gypsy has been accused of magic for no better reason than was Esmeralda, in Victor Hugo's novel, "Notre Dame de Paris," the Gypsy girl who was killed because she had a trained goat that could dance and play tricks. Even nowadays there lingers a mystery about the Gypsies in their tents.

It is this difference, this mystery, that has set not a few scholars to the study of the Romany, and his manner of life. It fascinated George Borrow, who went to wander with the wanderers and pitch his tent by theirs, in the quiet dingle or by the roadside; and Charles G. Leland, who in all his travels in England or Egypt, America or Russia, has given his first thoughts to the Romanies of the country; Francis Groome spends days and hours "In Gypsy Tents;" Hubert Smith married a Gypsy. It is not merely the Romany himself that interests these men; it is his language, or jargon—for language it really is no longer. But the strange words the Gypsies use, stringing them together with English phrases and expressions, are the surest proof of their Hindoo origin, says Wide Awake. Some, constantly in the mouths of these shabby, shiftless wanderers, are to be found in the Vedas, the oldest sacred hymns in existence. Others are in common use to-day in India. A friend of mine once told me she was learning Romany as a beginning to the study of Sanscrit and Hindiostanee.

Innocent Men Convicted—Pat Rice's Story.

"Many a man has been convicted innocently," said Pat Rice the other day, while discussing the unfortunate case wherein Geo. Nelson was sent to the State Prison, and who was afterward shown to have been innocent. Pat Rice is an old time officer from "way back in the fifties." "I'll tell you of a case," said Rice, "illustrative of the uncertainty of human testimony. It was in the early days of Folsom. A Frenchman had been murdered near the town, and there was considerable excitement. An old German was the only eye witness, and the murderers escaped. Word was sent to Sacramento police department to send up some officers to ferret out the culprits. Well, Officer Len Harris and myself were detailed for the work. We both disguised ourselves and proceeded to the scene of the murder. Our disguise was complete, and we looked like two old '49' miners. Folsom had two Constables at the time, who were very actively engaged in working up the case. We arrived at the scene of the murder the next day. Sometime in the afternoon, while drifting around to see if we could get a clue, we noticed the Constables eyeing us closely. Both Constables knew us well when in our proper persons. We did not wish those worthies to ascertain who we were, or what mission engaged upon. Presently we overheard conversations between these officers which developed the fact that they took us for the murderers. Of course, we smiled in our sleeves. So earnest became these country Vidocqs that they finally arrested us on the charge of murder, and brought us before the Justice of the Peace and the old German who it was claimed saw the murderers run away. Well, as sure as the world, that old fellow positively identified me as one of them. He was not positive about Harris, and thought he was not one of the persons. Harris was discharged, and I was arraigned and placed on my examination for the murder. When searched my fine revolver, which I always carried on such missions, and one which was presented to me by the force, was taken from me, and declared to have been the pistol which was used in the murder. The Justice of the Peace, desiring to give me a fair chance, appointed a noted character in that time, O. C. Lewis, to defend me. The examination proceeded, and the testimony was positive against me. I was held to answer for murder. The joke was getting a little serious by this time, and just about the time I was to be placed on the cars for this city, I turned to Hugh Curran, who was the senior Constable, and laughingly discarded a portion of my facial disguise, and showed him that we were the detectives sent to "work up the case." As soon as this fact was disclosed I was at once released. But the funny part of the affair was when old Lewis, who acted as my lawyer, wanted to claim my fine pistol for defending me.

"Thus you see," said Mr. Rice, "how easy it might be, and often is, to convict an innocent man."

"By the way," continued the veteran officer, "I have the clue to the perpetrators of one of the most cowardly assassinations that ever occurred in this State. Many years ago a rich miner was assassinated and the assassin escaped. I may be able to give you a genuine sensation some of these fine days."

Boodle Legislators.

There is a singular fatality about the private office of the State Library so far as members of the Assembly are concerned. First, Assemblyman Bruner, it is alleged, was trapped there, and then his colleagues, Marion and Dibble, some days later were accused of having been bartering for votes.

This truly has been a Legislature long to be remembered as one of investigations. Never before was so much corruption charged openly on the floor in both houses. The only redeeming feature of the whole business is, that they did finally pass a ballot reform bill, and were forced by the populace to elect a United States Senator, Charles N. Felton, who is a credit to the State. If the Republican party ever "points with pride" to anything, it will not be to the present Legislature. The sooner they adjourn sine die, and return to their constituents, the better will it be for the State. It would not be fair to call them all boodlers, because there are some honorable men among them, but it will go into history as the "boodle session."

Opportunity.

Master of human destinies am I!
Fame, love and fortune on my footsteps wait,
Cities and fields I walk; I penetrate
Deserts and seas remote, and passing by Hovel and mart and palace, soon or late
I knock unbidden once at every gate!
If sleeping, wake; if festing, rise before
I turn away. It is the hour of fate,
And they who follow me reach every state
Mortals desire, and conquer every foe
Save death; but those who doubt or hesitate
Condemned to failure, penury and woe,
Seek me in vain and uselessly implore,
I answer not; and I return no more!

Sage Advice.

Dr. Wm. E. Hall, of New York, advises young men to get married. In the course of a lecture on this subject, he says: Marriage is natural. In the long ago the Creator made a beautiful garden and planted therein the first bachelor. The garden was full of loveliness and beauty, but all was not enough to make that solitary bachelor happy. And the Creator took pity on him and gave him a companion to fill the aching void in his heart. Since that all men have loved—poor and rich, men of every clime and of every time. God intended the human heart for love. Marriage is natural. The true philosophy of happiness in married life is that in giving love and sympathy mutual happiness is promoted. Marriage is beautiful. See the husband at home. Outside all perchance is cold and stormy, but inside all is warmth and comfort. In confidence and trust, in the sweet confidence of harmonious natures, is the sweetest music and greatest happiness on earth. Marriage is divine. When I was a pastor I could always tell when a man called on me, if he wanted to get married, and I would often tell him so before he had said a word about it.

I never saw a young man about to be married that wasn't frightened. I know I was, terribly. My wife wasn't then, but she has been ever since. In parts of the West where women are scarce the sight of a woman is good for sore eyes. Every bachelor in Oakland ought to have it painted on his back, "One-fourth of a man." The bone of which woman was made was not taken out of the man's hand or foot, but out of his side, that she might ever walk by his side and be near his heart.

Marry, and marry young. Don't overdo it. I see some very young men over there smacking their lips. Don't marry too young.

Did you ever notice the expression of a man's face, when he is dead in love?

The lecturer gave a comical sample of it, which caused roars of laughter. It was lackadaisical in the extreme.

Marry once, and twice if necessary. I believe second marriages are all right. Yes, marry twice if necessary—but when you are married stay married, and I'll tell you how to do it. Marry to suit yourself; don't marry the kinsfolk. Don't marry an invalid; don't marry a man to get rid of him; don't marry a man just because you're engaged to him, even if you are under the marriage bell, if you're sick of your bargain.

Emotion isn't love. Marriage isn't a mere picnic for one day. If you marry that girl you have a passing fancy for, you'll have to live with her twenty years. Be sure you are in love before you marry. When it's love, its love forever. When you're in love, young man, tell your father. When you're in love, young woman, tell your mother.

Don't drink, young man, if you want to stay married. Don't do it.

Young ladies, when the question is popped, don't say yes on the spot. Tell him he must give you time for reflection. The longer mourners are kept on the anxious seat the more likely are they to be converted. If a man talks glibly to you, and quotes poetry, and fires off old chestnuts at you, he is not in earnest. Stand him off; draw the dead line on him. Girls, don't marry a man just for money. Marry a man, if you marry him, for his character, his manhood. If he has the money in addition, don't refuse him just on that account.

Finally, girls, don't flirt. Don't hang your heads out on the front door. It's a mistake. Young men don't flirt. The best time for popping a question is on a buggy ride, and don't do it when the girl has got the toothache. The lecturer gave a highly colored account of his own experience under these circumstances, only she popped the question and he said yes. Don't have your honeymoon all in a lump. Distribute it along through life.

LOCAL BREVITIES.

The most virtuous man in the Legislature is Senator Campbell, of Solano. He is a Solon among boodlers, so he says.

La Grippe is visiting Sacramento. He has called upon almost every family. It is hoped that his stay in our midst will be short.

The Assessor is abroad, and every one so fortunate as to own anything is unfortunate enough to have to pay for the privilege.

Some of the local mining stock operators are in high glee. Con. Virginia has taken a "spurt," and a "big deal" is in prospect.

The Capitol grounds are not only the pride of Sacramento, but of the State as well. It is safe to say that no park of equal size in the State looks so well at this season of the year. The new gardener keeps his men a moving, and old Sol keeps the flowers a blooming.

Hard times, is what every one says. Money is scarce and hard to get, yet all manage to live and are happy. Several failures have been reported in this city during the past week. All were due to the fact that they did not heed the old maxim "too many irons in the fire some are bound to burn."

The Legislature will do an act of injustice if it does not pass the bill for the relief of F. Marion Wells, for $1,700. Mr. Wells lost that amount in constructing the Marshall Monument. It bankrupted him. He owes it for labor, and it goes to poor people in Amador and El Dorado counties. Every native son, every pioneer, every friend of labor in the Legislature should vote for it.

An intelligent Chinaman, in conversation with a reporter yesterday, said that there was a constant emigration of the Chinese from this State to the Atlantic seaboard, the objective points being New York and Massachusetts. Mott street, in New York city, is more populous to-day than Chinatown in San Francisco. It is estimated that Sacramento county has lost 1,000 of its Chinese population in the past year. "So mote it be."

DRAMATIC NOTES.

There has been a dearth of amusements this week. The Stanley lecture was the sole attraction at the theaters.

On Monday and Tuesday All the Comforts of Home will be given at the Metropolitan. It is said to be running over in fun and musical excellence.

Rev. O. C. Wheeler.

Very many of the old-time residents of this city will regret to learn of the serious illness of Rev. O. C. Wheeler. It is stated by the press that his death is expected. Rev. Wheeler started in life on his own account, with a capital of but three shillings, earned the money by which he was educated, and entered the ministry. In 1848 he was called to go to California as a missionary, and with his family reached San Francisco early in 1849. He established a church, the building being sided and floored with lumber and roofed with old sails. Part of the mechanical work he performed with his own hands. He labored earnestly and soon after organized his church. Another of the pioneer ministers was Rev. Albert Williams, now a resident of West Orange, New Jersey. We have an interesting communication from him in criticism of the California papers now being published in the Century magazine, and it will be published in the next number of THEMIS. Rev. Wheeler on September 9, 1850, came to Sacramento and organized the First Baptist church, at the residence of Judge E. J. Willis, on H street, between Sixth and Seventh. On the following day the first public services were held in the court-house. In the spring of 1851 a house of worship, costing $4,000, was erected on the corner of L and Seventh streets. This building was destroyed in the great fire of 1852. In 1854 a church building was erected on Fourth street, between K and L, and it was occupied there till 1877, when it was sold and removed to Fourteenth and K streets. It is now occupied by the United Brethren of Christ. Rev. Wheeler was the Baptist pastor here until 1854, when he was succeeded by Rev. J. L. Shuck, and was for many years thereafter connected with the State Agricultural Society. Later on he was appointed General Baggage Agent of the railroad company.

A Premature Disagreement.

"What was the basis of Mr. and Mrs. Futill's separation?"

"Well, you know their baby—the one that was born last month?"

"Yes."

"Futill said he should go to Yale, and Mrs. F., who is from Boston, insisted on Harvard."—Philadelphia Press.

It is encouraging to note the fact that the religious world is awakening to the need of missionary work in the large cities. A Musselman is collecting money in India to build a Mohammedan mosque in Liverpool.

Weeping Willows.

On Wednesday last, March 18th, the Angel of Death beckoned to him, and Abraham Sites crossed the dark river into that unknown country from which no traveler returns. Few men were better acquainted in Sacramento, and none had more friends than the deceased. He was born in Ohio, seventy-five years ago; had lived out more than the three score years and ten allotted to man, and only a week prior to his death his friends looked upon him as one who would live to be a centenarian. His illness was only a few days, and his death was a surprise to all. Mr. Sites came to California with the pioneers of this State, and for the past forty-one years has been a resident of this city. From the time the Golden Eagle Hotel was built until he died, he was almost continuously connected with it either as clerk or manager. No man in the State was better acquainted with the traveling public, none more obliging and none more thoroughly appreciated. Affable, pleasant, honest, ever obliging, he counted every one he met a friend, and an enemy, to him, was an unknown quantity. His end was a quiet and peaceful one, surrounded by those he loved. Kind and loving hands smoothed his dying pillow. His remains were laid away yesterday in the City Cemetery, by the side of his wife, who died some years ago. The remains in a beautiful casket, ornamented with the most costly trimmings, were life-like. The floral offerings were numerous and beautiful. One, by the employees of the hotel where he had been employed for nearly half a century, was the representation of the "Gates Ajar." It stood several feet in height, and at the base, worked in immortal, were the words "Our Chief." The funeral services were conducted by the Rev. John F. von Herlich, and were very impressive. The singing was by a special choir, composed of Mrs. Coppersmith, Miss Sheehan, Joseph Genshlea and Richard T. Cohu. The pall bearers were Col. James McNassar, Senator Wm. Johnston, S. S. Nixon, A. B. Guthrie, Mayor W. D. Comstock and Wm. Beckman. Deceased leaves a son, Corwin K. Sites, a resident of Rapid City, Dakota, and a niece, Mrs. William Lane, at Georgetown, in El Dorado county.

An Unexpected Result.

An analysis of the Canadian elections discloses some unexpected results. It was thought that the outside provinces, Newfoundland, British Columbia, Manitoba, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edwards Island, were likely to give majorities in favor of the liberal policy, and closer relations with the United States, and that Sir John McDonald would have his majorities in Ontario and Quebec. The New York Tribune thus describes the situation: Sir John went into the election with fifty-six Ontario supporters. He came out with forty-four, having lost the delegation by one vote. He went in with thirty-six Quebec supporters, and issued with only thirty, leaving the delegation in the control of the Opposition by four majority. These results were all that the most sanguine of Liberals could have expected. Had there been the same percentage of change in the other provinces—and there, if change was at all probable, was where it might be most confidently looked for—the Liberal triumph would have been overwhelming. It was certainly fair to presume that the Liberal policy held public favor in each of these provinces, except, possibly, British Columbia. Only eight months before they had elected Liberal Provincial Governments. Their exports went into the United States in immense bulk already, and when the additional privilege of free fish had been granted by the Americans, their entire surplus would be shipped to Boston and New York. New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were but extensions of the coast line, and in closer communion every day in the week with New England than with the St. Lawrence country. Manitoba was similarly placed, being only an extension of North Dakota, and dealing in dollars at St. Paul where it dealt in dimes at Toronto.

Felton our Senator.

In the selection of Chas. N. Felton to represent the State of California in the United States Senate, the Republican Legislature is to be congratulated. There is no doubt that if the election had been left to the Republican voters of this State, that Charles N. Felton would have been their choice. Although a man of great wealth, no one has the hardihood to accuse him of buying his election. Chas. N. Felton is a man of brains, of large business and political experience; a gentleman who has a standing in Washington, and one who will command the respect of all his colleagues. The Republican party had several candidates, all good men, but Felton had the call. We would have been safe with Estee; Blanchard would have been a credit to the State; Perkins is any man's peer; De Young would have made his mark, being a man of brains and influence, while our own Wm. Johnston would have suited all the people. The election is over, boodle was not in it, Felton is our Senator, and we are all satisfied.

Maidens in Russia.

The daughter is a great pet in Russian families, perhaps because there are generally sons more than daughters. Take the younger members of the imperial family as an example, and we find 22 grand dukes and only 7 grand duchesses; and this may be stated as about the average proportion in most families. The necessity for men in the rural districts as assistants in the agricultural labors of their fathers has given rise to the saying, "One son is no son; two sons are half a son; but three are a whole son." Notwithstanding the pride and satisfaction with which the birth of a boy is hailed, the little girl is the darling, the object of the tenderest affection and care of parents and brothers, not to speak of other relatives.

Much is not expected of her in the way of assistance in the family; she is indulged as far as their means and circumstances permit, and she takes it quietly and as her due, but it is rarely that she does not voluntarily and tacitly contribute her share in helping her mother. Her occupations are much about the same as those of all European girls, but parish work in Russia existeth not for her. She cannot have classes at Sunday schools, as religion is taught by priests or deacons. It would be thought quite extraordinary and improper were a young unmarried girl to visit the sick or poor in towns, but in villages it is sometimes done under the direction of mamma or grandmamma. She is undoubtedly fond of pleasures, likes to be well dressed, and generally adores dancing. Music is not the Russian girl's forte, nor is solo singing. Most of the institutkas, though they thoroughly know the theory of music, play like a child of 12; of course there are exceptions, but it is seldom you find a girl able to play a quadrille or polka off hand.

Girls marry very young in Russia, and there are very few of those most estimable individuals called old maids. There are no colonies for the Russian to run away to, and statistics show that the births of boys much exceed those of girls.

Long engagements are not approved of; they seldom last longer than a few months, during which time the fiancé is the mistress of the house. Her girl friends assemble to help to sew the dowry, the sewing afternoon generally ending in a dance after tea, when the bridegroom drops in with a few bachelor friends. Another wedding is thus often arranged; and so on, little by little, till, like the 51 cards in the game of "old maid," they pair off, and one, generally of the sterner sex, is left forlorn.—The English Magazine.

An Erroneous Idea.

The idea is prevalent in some communities that young men are fit neither for generals nor statesmen, and that they must be kept in the back ground until their physical strength is impaired by age, and their intellectual faculties become blunted by the weight of years. Let us look to the history of the past, and from the long list of heroes and statesmen select some who have distinguished themselves, and we shall find that they were young men when they performed those acts which have won for them an imperishable meed of fame, and placed their names high on the page of history. Alexander, the conqueror of the then whole civilized world, viz: Greece, Egypt and Asia, died at 33. Bonaparte was crowned Emperor of France when 33 years of age. Pitt, the younger, was about 20 years of age when, in Britain's Parliament, he boldly advocated the cause of the American colonies, and but 22 when made Chancellor of the Exchequer. Edmund Burke at the age of 25 was first Lord of the Treasury. Our own Washington was but 25 when he covered the retreat of the British troops at Braddock's defeat, and was appointed to the command-in-chief of all the Virginian forces. Alexander Hamilton, at 20, was a Lieutenant-Colonel and aid to Washington; at 25, a member of Congress; at 33, Secretary of the Treasury. Thomas Jefferson was but 32 when he drafted the ever memorable declaration of independence. At the age of 30 years, Sir Isaac Newton occupied the mathematical chair at Cambridge college, England, having by his scientific discoveries rendered his name immortal. We might continue the list to a greater length, but enough has been said already to show that the idea that young men are not capable of performing great and ennobling actions, or of taking a high position in the councils of a nation, is chimerical and visionary. And what has been said may well serve to encourage the young to set up a high standard and press towards it with ardor, suffering nothing to discourage them from soaring onward and upward in the paths of fame, or in the pursuits of literature and science.

Before a girl becomes a wife she cannot help planning sometimes how she may spend her allowance from her husband to the best advantage; afterward she often spends a good deal of time planning how she may get an allowance to spend.

The Way it is Done in Maine.

There is a brotherly feeling of good-fellowship and generosity among men who are so situated that some luxuries are practically unattainable, says the New York Tribune. It was at a certain convention in a town in Maine that a well-known man of that State went to his room after several hours of hard work late at night. He found acquaintances there smoking cigars and chatting. "Thank goodness you've come," said one of them, "we are dyin' for a drink and haven't been able to get a drop. Got any?" But the owner of the room had not a drop either. He sat down and stroked his chin thoughtfully. "I think a little night-cap would do me good," he said; "I have been working pretty hard. But how shall we get it?" Then an idea occurred to him. "I'll bet," he went on, "that H— has a flask in his room, but he won't be up there. Now, if we could only get his key." He rang the bell, and when a boy appeared he sent him down to the clerk for a lot of keys. The boy returned with a string of about 200 jangling keys. "Now, B—," said the owner of the room, "go up to H—'s room, unlock the door with one of these keys, and if there's a flask there bring it down. B—, armed with the keys, started on his mission. He found the room and, after working with the lock for five or ten minutes, succeeded in unlocking the door. When he got inside and struck a match he saw a demijohn on a table. Picking it up he started to go out, when a man in his nightshirt came out of an adjoining room. "Well," he said, "this is cool. What are you doing with my demijohn?" B— began to stammer out his apologies. "I thought this was H—'s room," he explained, "and I came up here to get some of his whisky. S— sent me up." The man in the nightshirt began to laugh. "S— sent you, did he?" he asked. "Well, this isn't H—'s room, and I never met S—; we are on the opposite side of the fence politically. But I guess you men can't be allowed to suffer for a drink just because your politics is wrong." Thereupon he took a water-pitcher—one of these heavy hotel-pitchers—emptied the water out of it, and filled it from the demijohn. "Give my compliments to S—," he said, "and I won't lock the door; you may want to fill the pitcher again. Good-night," and he went to bed.

The Seven Wise Men.

It is said that seven famous mottoes were inscribed in the Temple of Apollo, at Delphi, as follows: Solon of Athens—"Know thyself." Chilo of Sparta—"Consider the end." Thales of Miletus—"Suretyship is the precursor of ruin." Bias of Priene—"Most men are bad." Cleobulus of Lindus—"Avoid excess." Pittacus of Mitylene—"Know thy opportunity." Periander of Corinth—"Nothing is impossible to industry." But there are many variations of these proverbial expressions, as the ancients do not agree in their accounts of these sages (who lived five or six hundred years before Christ), their lives or their sayings. Those given above have the best authority. The following translation of a Grecian doggerel gives one version:

I'll tell the names and sayings, and the places of their birth,
Of the seven great ancient sages, so renowned on Grecian earth:
The Lidian Cleobulus said, "The man was still the best;"
The Spartan Chilo, "Know thyself," a heaven-born phrase confessed;
Corinthian Periander taught "Our anger to command;"
"Too much of nothing," Pittacus, from Mitylene's strand;
Athenian Solon thus advised, "Look to the end of life;"
And Bias from Priene showed, "Bad men are the most ripe;"
Milesian Thales urged that "None should e'er a surety be."
Few were these words, but if you'll look you'll much in little see.

Geological Time Divisions.

The divisions of time established by geologists are based upon the formations of rock strata and the advents of different forms of life. The grand divisions are five in number, and are named Archæan or Ezoic era, Paleozoic era, Mesozoic era, Cenozoic era, and Psychozoic era. There are seven "ages" belonging to the eras, respectively, as follows: Archæan age, subdivided into Huronian and Laurentian periods; Salurian age, or age of invertebrates or mollusks; Devonian age, or age of fishes; and Carboniferous age, or age of acrozoans and amphibians; Age of Reptiles, subdivided into the Triassic, Jurassic and Cretaceous periods; Age of Mammals subdivided into Tertiary period, embracing the Eocene, Miocene and Pliocene epochs, and Quarternary period, embracing the Terrace, Champlain and Glacial epochs. Age of Man, Human period and Recent epoch. The names of the eras are all derived from the Greek, and signify: Ezoic, life of the dawn; Paleozoic, ancient life; Mesozoic, middle life; Cenozoic, recent life; and Psychozoic, life of the soul and mind.

If we were judged by one another, no sinner would ever reach heaven, and it would go harder even with the saints.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of Edwin C. Barclay, an insolvent debtor. Edwin C. Barclay having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said Edwin C. Barclay is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the county of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said Edwin C. Barclay, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the county of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court room of said Court, on the 10th day of April, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M., of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS a newspaper of general circulation published in the county of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. Dated, February 25th, 1891.

A. P. CATLIN,
Judge of the Superior Court.
FRANK D. RYAN, Attorney for Petitioner. f25-6t

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to DAVID KIZER, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 29th day of January, 1891, in which action, Annie Kizer is plaintiff, and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of said Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between plaintiff and defendant on the grounds of desertion and failure to provide; also, for the care, custody and control of the minor children, the issue of said marriage, viz: Nettie and Edna, aged 5 years, and 15 months respectively, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made; and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint. In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do herewith set my hand [SEAL.] and affix the seal of said Court, this 29th day of January A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.

The Stranger's Field.

A stranger traveling in Africa with only two or three attendants can go about without much fear of molestation. A great armed body like the Stanley expedition will be obliged to fight at times, of course, but I never had any use at all for a weapon of any kind in Africa, says Bishop Taylor.

There are some things that a solitary traveler can find out about Africa which a large expedition will never learn. I observed one custom that I never saw mentioned in any traveler's accounts. I noticed that every village had set apart a field for the use of strangers. The chief wife of the tribal king cultivated this field and stored away the product in the upper half of her hut. No man of the tribe was permitted to touch of the food thus stored. The king's wife had her share of this and made her living out of it, but all over and above the amount actually consumed must be set apart and preserved. This field is known as the "Stranger" field.

Whenever a stranger comes to the village he makes known his want to the king, and he is immediately relieved. The best hut in the village is set apart for him, he eats of the food of the stranger's field and the best wife of the king prepares the food for him with her own hand. He remains a week or a month, or any reasonable length of time, and his time is never hastened. Sometimes he stays long enough to become a member of the tribe, and he marries into the king's family.

An amusing feature of this custom is the fact that indigent members of the tribe sometimes leave their village and go to other villages and become strangers, so that very often when a familiar face has been missed from a certain village, and I have asked where So-and-so went or what became of him, some one has gravely informed me that So-and-so was poor and became a stranger. Subsequently I have run across lazy So-and-so in a distant village, living on the fat of the land as a stranger, and being treated to royal hospitality. There are no beggars in Africa. When a man or woman becomes too poor to get along comfortably, he or she makes the circuit of the adjacent villages as a stranger.

The path from me to you that led,
Untrodden long, with grass is grown;
Mute carpet that his lieges spread
Before the Prince Oblivion,
When he goes visiting the dead.

And who are they but who forget?
You, who my coming could surmise
Ere any hint of me as yet
Warned other ears and other eyes,
See the path blurred without regret.

But when I trace its windings sweet
With saddened steps, at every spot
That feels the memory in my feet,
Each grass blade turns forget me not,
Where murmuring bees your name repeat.
—James Russell Lowell.

A HORSE WHO CAN TALK!

Everybody has heard of a "horse laugh," but who has ever seen an equine gifted with the power of speech? Such an animal would be pronounced a miracle; but so would the telegraph and the telephone a hundred years ago. Why, even very recently a cure for consumption, which is universally acknowledged to be scrofula affecting the lungs, would have been looked upon as miraculous, but now people are beginning to realize that the disease is not incurable. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will cure it, if taken in time and given a fair trial. This world-renowned remedy will not make new lungs, but it will restore diseased ones to a healthy state when other means have failed. Thousands gratefully testify to this. It is the most potent tonic, or strength restorer, alternative, or blood-cleanser and nutritive, or flesh-builder, known to medical science. For Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh in the Head, and all Lingular Coughs, it is an unequalled remedy. In derangements of the stomach, liver and bowels, as Indigestion, or Dyspepsia, Biliousness, or "Liver Complaint," Chronic Diarrhea, and kindred ailments, it is a sovereign remedy.

GUARANTEED.

"Golden Medical Discovery" is the only medicine of its class, sold by druggists, under a printed guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will benefit or cure in every case of disease for which it is recommended, or money paid for it will be promptly refunded.

The Sapphire.

The sapphire is described as a gem excelled in value by no precious stone except the diamond, and is regarded as a variety of corundum, highly transparent and brilliant. It is sometimes colorless, and the colorless kind, called white sapphire, is sometimes sold as diamond. It more frequently exhibits exquisite color, generally a bright red or a beautiful blue; more rarely, gray, white or green. The red variety is the oriental ruby of lapidaries; the blue is that commonly called sapphire, and which has received its name from ancient times. It is found crystallized, usually in six-sided prisms, terminated by six-sided pyramids, and is sometimes found imbedded in gneiss; but it more frequently occurs in alluvial soils. It occurs at Biliu, in Bohemia, and Expailly, in Auvergne, but more abundantly in some parts of the East. Ceylon is famous both for its rubies and its sapphires, the latter being more abundant. They occur with garnets and other minerals in a stratum of water-worn pebbles firmly imbedded in clay, in which there are occasional lumps of granite and gneiss. A piece of sapphire, dug out of the alluvium within a few miles of Ratnapoor, in 1853, was valued at upward of $20,000. The sapphire was one of the stones in the breastplate of the Jewish high priest. Among the Greeks it was sacred to Jupiter. The name Girasol sapphire is given to a beautiful variety with a pinkish or bluish opalescence, and a peculiar play of light. The Chatoyant sapphire has more pearly reflections. The Astoria sapphire has in the midst of it a star of six bright rays resulting from its crystalline structure.

The Laughing Plant.

There appears to be a "laughing plant," which grows in Arabia. It has received its name from the effects produced by eating its seeds. The plant is of moderate size, with bright yellow flowers and soft velvety seed pods, each of which contains two or three seeds resembling small black beans. The natives of the district where the plant grows dry these seeds and reduce them to powder. A small dose of this powder has similar effects to those arising from the inhalation of laughing gas. It causes the most sober person to dance, shout and laugh with the boisterous excitement of a lunatic, and to rush about cutting the most ridiculous antics for about an hour. At the expiration of this time exhaustion sets in and the excited person falls asleep, to wake after several hours with no recollection whatever of what he has been doing.

There was a boy in our town,
All loaded down with sin;
He came across a slot machine
With "Drop a nickle in."

He tied a nickle on a string
And dropped it deftly through;
He worked the thing, got a cigar,
And saved his nickle, too.

Time after time he dropped his coin
Thus deftly through the slot,
And filled his pockets with cigars
Until he had the lot.

The judge, in passing on the case,
Said that this boy of sin
Was guiltless, as he was not told
To leave the nickle in.

The Gila monster is a lizard found in the desert portion of Arizona. It is about fifteen inches long, and has been supposed to be dangerously poisonous; but it appears that its bite, although inconvenient, has proved to be, at least, less poisonous than at first presumed. Its name is derived from Gila, a river which rises in the Sierra Madre in southwest New Mexico and flows first southwest and then west through South Arizona into the Colorado of the West.

"What ailed you last night; were you sick?" "Had an awful nightmare. Dreamt I opened a jack pot with four aces pat, and no one came in."

Last week we made editorial allusion to the machinations of marriageable English women against the American girl. In view, however, of what has happened since that account was written, it is necessary to refer to the subject again. From certain proceedings that are going forward in Canada, there is no room to doubt that the American girl, the friend and hope of all future census enumerators, is in danger. It is as plain as anything can be that the marriageable women of England have enlisted the diplomats and military leaders among their own countrymen in their campaign against the American girl. It is an underhand and scandalous piece of business, in which Salisbury and General Lord Wolseley are to be the principal actors. The English woman finds herself overmatched by the American girl, so she does not hesitate to resort to stratagems and tricks, such as are common among men. Schemes, the most secret and plausible, are being devised with an eye single to getting an underhold on the American girl. Just look at what is going on in Canada. Under pretense of prosecuting one Edward Farrar for high treason, ten regiments of British troops are to be thrown into British America to become a menace to the American girl, and a rankling thorn in her side, as it were. The prosecution of Farrar is a sham, the sole object of which is to get a little nearer the American girl's lines of defense. By the way, the prosecution of Farrar is a highly amusing proceeding. Edward Farrar is a politician of some note, and was a candidate for a seat in the Canadian Parliament at the recent election. Whether he was elected or not, we do not remember, nor is it a matter of present importance. His political policy embraces two propositions: First, unrestricted trade with the United States, and second, the annexation of British America to the American Union. If Mr. Farrar could secure the adoption of his first proposition—that is, if he could secure the right to dump the products of the farms, forests, and coal mines of British America on the American market, he would be satisfied to abandon the second division of his policy. But inasmuch as the free trade policy was defeated at the recent election for members of Parliament, Mr. Farrar is now an out-and-out annexationist. But the course that he advises should be taken is the very opposite of violence. He asks his people to consider their situation from the commercial or material point of view, and determine for themselves whether it would not be better to renounce their allegiance to the British crown, and cast in their lot with the people of the United States. So Mr. Farrar's conduct cannot be said to amount to levying war against his own government, and, therefore, cannot be said to constitute treason, in the sense that he has used, or has advised the use of force. He is equally innocent under the second definition of treason, which consists in adhering to the enemy of one's country, and giving him aid and comfort in time of peace.

The United States is at peace with Britain, and all her dependencies—unless marriageable English women be regarded as dependencies—so it would be impossible for Mr. Farrar to succor us as an enemy. Nevertheless, a firm of Toronto lawyers have advised the government that Mr. Farrar has committed high treason, and may be punished accordingly. Such nonsense was never exploited before since the English speaking race began to govern themselves. Statesman Ben Butterworth, of Ohio, is just as much of a high traitor, or high treasoner, or whatever the proper name for this new sort of criminal might be, as is Mr. Edward Farrar. The meanest thing the Democratic party has done in the last forty years, except when it attempted to overthrow the government, was to so gerrymander the First Ohio District as to shut Butterworth out of Congress. The American people do not desire the adoption of either branch of Mr. Farrar's policy. We would be perfectly willing to trade with the Canadians on an equal footing, but we have no use whatever for British America as a part of our political system. Nevertheless, statesman Ben Butterworth, although a sound protectionist in a general way, has been advocating free trade with Canada, and the annexation of that division of the British Empire for the last ten years. Now, what would be thought of a firm of American lawyers, such as the one to which Joseph Choate belongs, or the one to which ex-President Cleveland belongs, if they should set forth to the American public that statesman Ben Butterworth is a high traitor or a high treasoner, as they might choose to designate his crime.

This high treason business is nothing but a diabolical scheme against the rightful supremacy of the American girl, and if that pink and model of womanhood is wise she will take instant measures to protect herself on the flank and in all other directions. The high treason proceedings against Mr. Farrar are merely a pretext for establishing a standing army along the Canadian border. It is pretended that the soldiers are to be used to put down the annexationists—but this is not true. They are intended to intimidate the American girl whenever she feels like making an incursion into Canada in search of a husband. But the American girl will be equal to the emergency—you'll see if she isn't. The Tory government of Canada is courting downfall. It is laying a foundation for the invasion of Canada by the American girl. If the English woman has to give way before the American girl, when she goes forth in search of a husband, what might be expected in the case of Canada? If Sir John Macdonald knows what is best for him, he will keep the English soldiery out of Canada, and moderate his policy in the high treason business. If he forces matters to such a crisis as to compel the American girl to declare open war, he may as well bid farewell to power.

Commoner Charles Stewart Parnell is among the later examples of how a man of good mental powers and wide and varied experience may become so dulled morally, that he falls into the habit of looking at the world as if it were in a state of hopeless ethical obfuscation. It was not a clash of opinions as to the policy of the Irish National party that led to the rupture which now exists in that organization. The Liberal party, of which Gladstone is the head, and of which the National party is a mere adjunct, has not shifted its course in the least.

Nevertheless, and notwithstanding the gains which the Liberals have made, if a Parliamentary election were to be held in the near future, in all probability the Tories would carry the day. The home rule agitation is simply one phase of the movement toward local self-government, a tendency which embraces the whole world in its sweep. There did not appear to be anything in the way to prevent the success of the policy of the Liberal party within the next few years—possibly at the next Parliamentary election—until Parnell made up his mind that Mrs. O'Shea was a more important factor in the government of the United Kingdom than an Irish Parliament.

Religious thought, which is a great force in England, was turning a more willing ear to the appeals of the Irish people for a more direct participation in their own political affairs. Within the last few years, notably by the Reform Act of 1885, over two and a half millions of voters have been added to the rolls, a majority of whom have become favorable to the Liberal policy. No Ministry has ever been more sagacious than that of Salisbury, to avoid a vote in the Commons on any issue that might result in a defeat to the government, and thereby make an appeal to the country unavoidable. The situation was such that the result of a night might put the Tory party out of power.

Just at this juncture, Parnell came along with the O'Shea woman. And, with the O'Shea woman as his chief of staff, he wants to lead the Irish National party, and appeals to Irish Americans for money to help him carry on business. This appeal for more money is the most exasperating and brazen affront that was ever flaunted in the faces of Irish Americans. Parnell tells us that malcontent office seekers, and envious persons have crept into the party, and are endeavoring to destroy it. This is not true, and every well-informed person knows that it is not true. The Irish National party was working in harmony, and the Liberal policy was making good headway, until Commoner Charles Stewart Parnell crept into Captain O'Shea's bed. Ireland has 103 members in the House of Commons, of whom 73 are Home Rulers, and of these Parnell has the sympathy of but six. With these six, he expects to suppress the other sixty-six Home Rule members, and restore order, provided Irish Americans supply him with enough money. Parnell sits for the city of Cork, and he couldn't be re-elected from that division under any circumstances. While the Chancellor of the Exchequer was asking the government the other evening for a credit of $105,000, to keep the famine out of Ireland, Parnell was off having a good time with Mrs. O'Shea. We are not unmindful of the services that Parnell has rendered to the Irish nation. He is a greater statesman than O'Connell, because he is more practical. It is quite clear, however, that he is more in need of a moral doctor than he is of money.

The solicitude for our High School pupils, regarding their health and the hours of study, seems to have aroused the youngsters. In these days, the rising generation feel that there is little left for their elders to know. While it is true that our youth are not given to such ills as those which affect the appetite, and generally can digest with ease anything from unripe apples to rubber-hose, still it becomes the duty of those in authority to regulate our public school system, and fix appropriate hours for study. The attempted sarcasm disclosed by the communication of the High School class, directed against the Board of Education and advisers, is decidedly out of place. One of the first lessons which our youth should be taught is respect to their seniors, particularly those in authority, and those who have given a life study to the subject under inquiry. There is a proper degree of independent thought that is deserving of consideration from the young, but the very bad taste and worse judgment which allowed our young friends to drift into this feeble irony is perfectly apparent. The schools, like all other public institutions, are the subject of government, and it illy becomes, either teacher or pupil, to attempt ridicule when proper regulations are suggested by those competent to direct and advise. However, under our present system, there is little danger of the students being either starved or broken down by over-study. Even if they should be required to devote a portion of the afternoon in the class-rooms, no dire apprehensions need follow. The hours now arranged seem to please the teachers and the pupils, and for that reason, should be the subject of consideration by the Board of Education, in order to determine whether it is best for the students and the public. If, upon a due investigation, it appears that the teacher and students should be allowed the whole afternoon in the summer months, and that this will be conducive to the advancement of their education and training, rather than to have afternoon hours for class study, then we say allow it to be so. But certainly we do not feel like permitting the teacher and students to fix the hours for their convenience alone. The public, who has to pay for the education of our youth, requires that a due consideration be given by the teachers. To our young student friends, let us say, that you may imagine you know about all that it is necessary to know at this time, but in a few years, after you have taken upon yourselves the responsibilities of life and of government, you will then realize how very little you in fact knew when students.

"EUREKA."

Two Well-Known Pioneers Take Issue With John S. Hittell.

BROOKLYN, February 26, 1891.

Francis D. Clark, Esq., President California Pioneer Society, New York City—DEAR SIR: The Century for this month contains a paper by John S. Hittell, in which he says that the gold of California was discovered on the 24th of January, 1848, and that he was the first to ascertain and announce that fact, thirty-seven years afterwards. Now, James W. Marshall, the man that discovered the gold, says that it was on the 19th. He always said so. He did not wait thirty-seven years before he said it. Contemporaneous history, written and unwritten, agrees with Marshall. Old pioneers have adopted that as the true date. On that day they hold their annual banquets and reunions. Fortunately, Mr. Hittell gives us the evidence on which he bases his claim, and we can, therefore, judge for ourselves. That evidence consists of an extract from the journal of our old friend, John Bigler, who was at Sutter's Mill when you arrived there. A little investigation will, I think, show that this journal fails to substantiate Mr. Hittell's claim. In his endeavor to disparage Marshall he has allowed himself to take too much for granted. Now, I am not a partisan of Marshall. My acquaintance with him did not lead to any close friendship, but I can see no reason for wishing to contradict him on this point, and to weaken the respect which we may have for the old man's memory. The "truth of history" does not require it. No other motive should prompt it. But to the proof. Bigler's journal under date of the 24th of January, says: "This day some kind of metal was found in the tail race, that looks like gold." Now, what does that prove. Does it prove anything more than it says. Is the truth of Marshall's statement, that he picked up gold on the 19th, at all impaired by it. Are not the two statements entirely in harmony with each other. Are they not wholly reconcilable with truth, and if they are, then what right have I to impeach the one and adopt the other? And yet Mr. Hittell regards this as conclusive evidence that Marshall did not know or could not tell on what day he first found the gold. Well, the old man is dead now. He is not here to answer for himself, but we can get along without him. We are not recounting our many proofs that Mr. Marshall was right; we are only trying to show that Mr. Hittell is wrong. But, perhaps, some one may say that the discovery of the gold was of so much importance, and would create such an excitement in the camp, that Bigler would surely enter it on his journal immediately; and that, therefore, this entry must denote the first discovery of the gold. All very well if it was only true, but it is only an inference. Mr. Hittell has drawn that inference, and that is where he has made a mistake, as we shall show. In the first place, Bigler did not make entries in his journal at the time of each occurrence, as any one can see by examining it. We that attempted to keep a journal in those times, can understand how it was whenever we found the leisure and had a good opportunity to write it up, how often it was we had to go back a few days and recall what had transpired. In the second place, the discovery of gold by Marshall created no excitement in the camp at all. History agrees that when Marshall first announced to his men that he had discovered the gold there was but little importance attached to his statements. It made no excitement in the camp. It was treated with derision. The men continued on with their work on the mill, which they had undertaken to build. All remained quiet. Bigler, as you well know, was not much given to sensation. No one will suppose that he was just then very anxious to enter on his journal what all hands were treating with derision. The next entry is on the 30th, wherein he speaks of the weather and afterwards of the gold, very briefly, and without excitement. The next entry is February 6th. He remarks about the weather, but says nothing at all about the gold. It would thus appear that there was no excitement in the camp whatever, along about this time. Under these circumstances it could not be expected that Bigler would make any note of the discovery. When, on the 24th, he did make that entry about some metal being found in the tail race, he did not mean to be understood that gold was discovered on that day for the first time. Just observe how he makes the entry. The Century gives a fac-simile of it. It is singular, but Bigler makes a marked difference between "discovering" and "finding" the gold. He first uses the word "discovered" in describing the metal to which he referred under date of May 24th, and then, as it were, remembering that Marshall had discovered the gold a few days before, he draws his pen across the word "discovered" and writes the words "was found." Now, why should he do this. Why should he strike out the word "discovered" and insert the words "was found," unless he saw it would convey a different meaning. Generally the terms or phrases can be used synonymously, but Bigler did not choose to do so. He chose to make a difference, and he did so, deliberately. As he looked upon it at that moment, there was in his mind a difference between discovering the gold and finding some metal in the tail-race, and he wished to give the credit for the founder where it belonged, and he did so by changing the language he had used. His expressions were fitted to his ideas. But this is not all. We have come down as far as February 6th in Mr. Bigler's journal. He had no sinister purpose to serve, no foolish ambition to gratify. He was for "the truth of history." In reading over his journal he saw that on the 24th he had written these words, "this day some kind of metal was found in the tail-race that looks like gold." He saw that this might be misleading; that some one might think it meant the first discovery of gold. He knew that Marshall had brought in specimens of the gold before that; that they had then regarded it as of no importance, not even worth noticing. So he takes his pen, and in extra black ink, as his journal shows, he inserts, "First discovered by James W. Marshall, the boss of the mill." Now, what does this mean? What does he refer to? Does he refer to the gold that was first discovered by Marshall on the 19th, or to the metal that was found in the tail-race on the 24th? Clearly, to the former. Had he meant the latter he would not have used the word "first." The use of that word "first" in qualifying the word "discovered" relates to priority of time. "First discovered," as used by Bigler, meant something besides present discovery. It was not to be mixed up with the discovery of to-day, with the finding in the tail-race. Had Bigler left out the word "first" then it might have been reasonably said he was referring to the metal found in the tail-race; to the findings of that day. But he did not leave it out. It was put there by him for some good reason of his own. It was his purpose to refer to the prior discovery by Marshall, on the 19th. In no other way can the use of that word "first" be harmonized with the facts or with good sense. Again, he does not say that the metal to which he referred on the 24th was found by Marshall; it probably was not found by him. Marshall's men had already begun to turn their attention to it. Several of them had found specimens and had brought them into camp. It was now no longer a matter of derision. The gold had been tested at Sutter's Fort and found to be pure. It was after all this had taken place when Bigler made the entry that Marshall was the first to discover the gold. He did not say so on the 24th. It was after the 30th that he said so; after he had written up his journal for the 30th. Look at the journal and see for yourself. It was probably as late as after the 6th of February. On that day he was using a different shade of ink, unusually dark, and it was in this ink that he made this entry, by interlining it on the journal of the 24th, thus going back at least thirteen days. Bigler nowhere says that the gold was first discovered on the 24th. His journal entries, properly and logically interpreted, says that on the 24th some metal, that looks like gold, was found in the tail-race. He does not dignify this as a discovery at all, but is particular to call it a finding. Gold was first discovered by Marshall, he says. True, he does not say on what day Marshall first discovered it, but Marshall himself has supplied that date. He said it was the 19th. He said so from the start. You made an examination of this question before you adopted that day for your annual reunion. I do not think that you will have to change the day; at least, not on such evidence as Mr. Hittell has offered. Besides, there is Sutter's journal, which says that on the 28th Marshall arrived at the Fort on important business. Marshall tells Gillespie that about a week after the first discovery of the gold he started for the Fort; that to gain what information he could respecting the value of the gold, he took all they had collected, and showed it to Sutter. Those who knew Marshall can understand that if he arrived at the Fort on the 28th, then he probably started on the 27th. From the 19th to the 27th, would be reasonably "about a week," while from the 24th to the 27th, would be but two or three days. Bigler says that in a week's time they had picked up more than a hundred dollars' worth. That is what Marshall took along with him. He took what he and they had picked up. He took what he had first discovered on the 19th, and also what had been found in the tail-race on the 24th, as well as all the rest. I have, as you and others know, always taken an interest in the early days of California. I know that as early as April, 1849, at Sutter's Mill, an inquiry was instituted, and a record was made as to the date on which gold was first discovered by Marshall, and that we agreed it was the 19th. I have never yet seen anything to justify me in changing my mind. Marshall was not a weak, vacillating man. He had his methods as well as any other man, and his memory of dates was regarded as good by those with whom he was associated. At this late date I can see no use in trying to impeach the record. The present attempt to do is certainly a failure. Bigler's journal, instead of impeaching the record, serves to sustain it; and, if possible, more firmly establishes the fact that Marshall first discovered the gold on the 19th. Yours truly,

DEMAS STRONG.

FRANCIS D. CLARK, ESQ., President Territorial Pioneers of California, New York:

MY DEAR SIR: You have doubtless read in the February number of the Century the article of our friend, Mr. John S. Hittell, in which he fixes the date of the great gold discovery on the 24th of January, 1848, a change from the 19th of that month hitherto accepted. The basis of Mr. Hittell's argument is an extract from the diary of Henry W. Bigler, one of the workmen in building the Coloma saw-mill. This is a transcript verbatim of the entry: "Monday, 24th this day some kind of metal was found in the tail-race that looks like gold first discovered by James Marshall, the Boss of the mill. Sunday, 30th, clear, and has been all the last week; our metal has been tried and proves to be gold. It is thought to be rich, we have picked up more than a hundred dollars worth last week."

The letter of this entry makes not for, but against Mr. Hittell's conclusion. See the fac-simile in the Century. Bigler began to write discovered, erased it, and wrote "found." Whoever the party, he was not a discoverer. Then comes another afterthought in the interlining, and this in different ink, as Mr. Hittell explains (written later, probably) of the words "first discovered by James Marshall, the Boss of the mill." So the finding of gold mentioned by Bigler was not the "discovery." He refers that event to a different time, earlier, evidently, and the 24th of January as the date of the original discovery is entirely wanting in substantial support. I am reminded here of the fourteenth reason of the Russian Commandant of a fort, for not firing a salute on the arrival of his Admiral, that he "had no powder."

The best authority for fixing the date, I know is that of Marshall. Yet he said he did not at the time note the day of the month. He was sure, however, it was not earlier than the 18th, nor later than the 19th of January. Assuming that date as correct, and the 28th of the same month of Marshall's visit to Sutter's Fort, according to the entry in the great Pioneer's journal, "on very important business," that is, to report the discovery, the interval of time is easily accounted for, and not too long to include all the known intermediate events. When Marshall told his discovery, and showed the pieces, only a slight impression was made upon the men employed at the mill. Work went forward, lively as usual. Spare time alone, at first, was utilized in looking for gold in the vicinity of the mill. A test of the quality of the mineral was made by Marshall, which led him to believe, from its malleability that it was gold. Afterward he went to the boarding house, and showing his find to the housekeeper, Mrs. Wimmer, asked, "Is not this gold?" The Wimmers were from a gold-bearing region, in North Carolina, and Mrs. W. at once became interested in the matter. She was at the time engaged in making soap, and taking a small nugget, value about five dollars, she dropped it in the boiling mass, with a ring from her finger, supposed to be gold. Here an interval, Marshall says, of two or three days occurred, and he bethought himself of the soap test, and going to the house, he said to Mrs. Wimmer, "Well, Jennie, what has become of our gold?" The boiling of the soap was finished, and the kettle and contents set aside. The nugget and ring were cut out of the solidified mass, and upon examination the ring was tarnished, an alloy, while the nugget was bright as when picked up in the tail-race. Marshall, in his published life, says, "In about a week's time after the discovery, I had to take another trip to the fort." This, doubtless, was the visit "on very important business," mentioned by Captain Sutter. The account of the scene at the fort, so well known, I need not repeat.

I am constrained to regard the fixing of the 24th of January, 1848, as the date of the gold discovery, from the record of Bigler's diary, a manifest non sequitur.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

De Wolf Hopper's next opera is called Wang.

The woman who wears a sun-bonnet narrows her own view of life, but the woman who wears a high hat cuts off that of the people behind her.

There must be considerable genuine sympathy felt for Mme. Sara Bernhardt, who has had the misfortune to meet with the enthusiastic approval of the Boston audiences. In justice to Sara it should be remembered that she is not to blame for this manifestation and ought not to be made to suffer for it.

The sudden death of Lawrence Barrett, one of the great actors of the age, leaves a void on the stage that cannot be soon filled. Mr. Barrett, at the time of his untimely death, was the partner of Edwin Booth, and engaged in presenting Shakespearean plays. He was the moving spirit of that grand combination, and whose keen business qualifications added to his art, made the enterprise a splendid success both in an artistic point of view, as well as financial. It is probable that the demise of Lawrence Barrett will cause the retirement of Edwin Booth from the stage.

From the same theater where Barrymore is just now depicting the agonies of a disgraced husband, comes Mrs. Schoeffel, better known as Agnes Booth. The actress, in all her splendid paraphernalia and fine sentiments of the stage, is quite another person from the plump and hungry lady who takes a seat opposite her manager husband and amiably bullies the waiter while she orders enough supper for six instead of two. As she eats she talks volubly, munching impartially off cold slaw, broiled lobster, steak and potatoes, and, winding up with an ice and champagne, goes off to sleep the sleep of the just and to a brisk rehearsal on the morrow.

A Chicago poet has dedicated a poem to Rudyard Kipling. That is one way of getting even.

An English publisher announces a new work entitled "He Always Pleased His Wife." It is fiction.

The rejection of most of the poems sent to the magazines is one sort of poetic justice, although most poets do not look at it in that light.

Carruthers—Poets are born. Waite—Yes, I suppose so. Still, it would be pretty hard work to establish a case against their parents.

King Humbert of Italy has often said: "I should wish to be a journalist were I not a king." Some men never are satisfied. A Kansas journalist sold his paper last week and bought a grocery store.

The present race of novel writers in this country, and to a lesser extent in England, are divided into two schools, or camps, which, in theory, if not in practice, are as violently opposed to one another as were the classicists and romanticists of the French theater some sixty years ago, when the dramas of Dumas and the melodramas of Hugo were beginning to undermine the frigid propriety of the tragedies of Racine and Corneille.

"The Great Taboo," by Grant Allen. In the days of King Charles the Second, an English sailor was cast ashore on an island in the Pacific—the only survivor of a shipwreck. He was forced to kill, in self-defense, the incarnation of the Sun-God, a vicious old barbarian, whose secret he had discovered. He became Sun-God himself, and taught the secret of his power to a parrot, which is still living two hundred years later, when a young Englishman and English woman are equally shipwrecked. Polly tells his tale with great volubility and saves their lives. The story is full of interesting particulars about the mysterious Taboo of Polynesia.

A certain brilliant woman who had come into a fortune on the death of her husband, found the bacillus of literary ambition pervading her system. Lacking originality, she employed her acquirements as a linguist to the task of building up a translator's reputation. Much to her disgust, all her efforts in this line were unavailing. Manuscript after manuscript was rejected by newspapers, book publishers and syndicates. She kept on, however, until her mind became unbalanced, and she was taken to an insane asylum. Among her papers the physician in charge of the case found an English rendition of one of Guy de Maupassant's stories. He sent the manuscript to a syndicate. It was accepted. The doctor thereupon presented a printed copy of her translation to his patient. The effect was magical. Her old ambition returned, her mind resumed its normal condition and she has been discharged from the asylum—cured. Once in a while publishers do a good deed.

Professional Chat.

"Hell is out of fashion," says Archdeacon Farrar, but if various other eminent clergymen are well informed, it will be a long time before fashion is out of hell.

"Hate him?" exclaimed the doctor; "I think I'll shoot him some day." "Don't do that," suggested his friend; "that's dangerous. Why don't you prescribe for him?"

Jerry Simpson should not feel indignant at the continued repetition of the charge that he does not wear socks. Horace Greeley was discharged from the composing room of the newspaper that he afterwards owned for not wearing socks. If Jerry's head is all right his socks may well pass out of sight.

Now and then Senator Leland Stanford tells a joke and smiles wearily as if he almost regretted it was so humorous. Here is an amusing skit of the variety order that he occasionally relates: "One day I was riding in a street car in San Francisco, when I overheard a conversation between two men that struck me as peculiarly funny. They may have been comedians rehearsing. One of them said: 'Well, Bob, I've got a job down town.' 'Yes? What doing?' 'Mixing lather.' 'That's queer: I've got a job up town in a barber shop lathering micks.'"

In some parts of Canada it is customary to call a Justice of the Peace or local magistrate "The Squire." One of these worthies, a very estimable man, who always enjoyed a good story, even if it was at his own expense, used to be fond of relating an experience he once had with an uneducated English farmer. After transacting some business the Squire and the Englishman sat down to enjoy a smoke together. When they had lighted their pipes the stolid Britisher started the conversation by remarking: "Hi notice as 'ow volks calls you 'The Squire.'?" "That's because I am a Justice of the Peace," replied the Canadian. "Things is so different hat 'ome." "Indeed?" "Yes. In Hingland a squire—w'y bless your 'eart, a squire; 'e's a gen'l'man!"—Harper's Magazine.

Given a man whose life is devoted to a professional pursuit and who draws chiefly on his mental energies, how shall he get the most and best out of himself and reach his maximum limit of longevity? There are two seemingly opposite methods now on trial. The one is hearty food with plenty of athletics; the other is moderate diet, avoidance of excitement, and good air. The athletic type of health-seeker eats hearty food and brings his digestive and alimentary organs into the fullest activity. In order to absorb it and dispose of the surplus of waste matter in the system, he takes active physical exercise every day. In short, he keeps the physical mill hard at work constantly. The seeker of health through abstinence eats moderately, his purpose being to tax his alimentary organs no more than is necessary. If he can keep his organs healthy he does not need so much exercise, since there is less matter in the system to be assimilated and disposed of. He keeps himself as calm as possible and avoids friction, but insists upon fresh air and takes moderate out-of-door exercise. Which of these two health-seekers is pursuing the best course, which will do in the aggregate most work, and which will wear out soonest? Immense attention is devoted to athletics, but far less is said of abstinence and the avoidance of useless friction.

The highest and most appreciated, because the rarest, form of wit is the ironical, which has the subtlest flavor; with an air of simplicity or apparent agreement, with a disguised, sarcastic tone. We have, unhappily, but few of these originals—Swift, Sterne, and, above all, Elia. Maule, the eminent judicial humorist—not "joker"—had this ironical gift; and the wit-amateur ever takes special delight in Maule's delicious jests, which are, unhappily, but too few. The most memorable and often quoted of his utterances is the famous one delivered at the Warwick Assizes on the trial of a prisoner for bigamy. The first wife had taken to drinking, pawned all his property, and finally gone off with her paramour. After the lapse of many years the prisoner had married, and was now indicted at the instigation, it was said, of the first wife's seducer. This hard case moved the Judge to express himself in the matchless piece of irony, which has excited such admiration. "Prisoner, you have been convicted upon clear evidence; you have intermarried with another woman, your wife being still alive. You have committed the crime of bigamy. You tell me, and, indeed, the evidence has shown, that your first wife left her home and her young children to live in adultery with another man. You say this prosecution is an instrument of extortion on the part of the adulterer. Be it so. I am bound to tell you that these are circumstances which the law does not, in your case, take the least notice of. You had no right to take the law into your own hands. Every Englishman is bound to know that when a wrong is done, the law, or perhaps I should say the Constitution, affords a remedy. Now listen to me and I will tell you what you ought to have done. Immediately you heard of your wife's adultery you should have gone to an attorney and directed him to bring an action against the seducer of your wife. You should have prepared your evidence, instructed counsel, and proved the case in court, and, recollect, it was imperative that you should recover, I do not say actually obtain, substantial damages. Having proceeded thus far, you should have employed a proctor and instituted a suit in the Ecclesiastical Court for a divorce a menso et thoro. Your case is a very clear one, and I doubt not you would have obtained your divorce. After this step your course was quite plain. You had only to obtain a private Act of Parliament to dissolve your marriage. This you would get, as a matter of course, upon payment of fees and part of the facts. You might then have lawfully married again. I perceive, prisoner, that you scarcely appear to understand what I am saying to you; but let me assure you that these steps are constantly taken by persons who are desirous to dissolve an unhappy marriage. It is true, for the one man has said it, 'a hated woman when she is married is a thing which the earth cannot bear,' and 'a bad wife is to her husband as rottenness to his bones.' You, however, must bear this great evil, or must adopt the remedy prescribed by the Constitution of your country. I see you would tell me that these proceedings would cost you £1,000, and that all your small stock in trade is not worth £100. Perhaps it may be so. The law has nothing to say to that. If you had taken these proceedings you would have been free from your present wife, and the woman whom you have recently married would have been a respectable matron. As you have not done so, you stand there a convicted culprit, and it is my duty to pass sentence upon you. You will be imprisoned for one day." It has been often repeated that this most original appeal helped more than anything else to bring about a reform in the marriage laws. But the calm, unaffected style of the speaker was half of the battle.

The Origin of Chess.

The origin of chess is covered with considerable mystery, yet there is little doubt its birthplace was in India, and that it is an offspring of a game called chaturanga, which is mentioned in Oriental literature as in use fully 2,000 years before the Christian era. From India chess spread into Persia, and thence into Arabia, and ultimately the Arabs took it to Spain and the rest of Western Europe. The game was in all probability invented for the purpose of illustrating the art of war. The Arab legend upon this point is that it was devised for the instruction of a young despot by his father, a learned Brahmin, to teach him that a king, notwithstanding his power, was dependent for his safety upon his subjects. The Greek historians credit the invention of the game to Palamedes, who, they claim, devised it to beguile the tedium of the siege of Troy during the Trojan war.

Benedict Arnold.

After the revolution Benedict Arnold resided principally in England, but was in Nova Scotia and afterward in the West Indies, where he was taken prisoner by the French, but made his escape. He died in Gloucester Place, London, June 14, 1801. Washington Irving, in the "Sketch Book," gives an account of a stately white wood tree near Tarrytown, N. Y., under whose shadow the captors of Major Andre obliged him to strip, when they discovered papers in his boots implicating Arnold. "This tree," says Irving, "the trunk of which was 26 feet in circumference and 41 feet high, was struck by lightning on the same day that intelligence of Arnold's death arrived at Tarrytown, a coincidence which many thought remarkable.

The Swiftest Runner.

As to the rate of speed, the ostrich is the swiftest runner on the face of the earth. The pace at which a strong ostrich can run is estimated to exceed sixty miles an hour, but this rate of progress is seldom kept up for more than a mile or so. When an ostrich is running at full speed its legs move so rapidly that the feet do not appear to touch the ground, and, according to Dr. Livingstone, the eye can no more follow them than it can follow the spokes of a carriage wheel in rapid motion. No race-horse can overtake the ostrich, and it would be impossible to catch it but for the habit it has of running in a circle. The hare is another very swift runner, going at the rate of nearly a mile a minute. The fleetness of the antelope tribe is proverbial. The swiftest dogs and horses are left far behind in the pursuit of these animals, and it is only by stratagem that they can be hunted with success.

NOTES.

The South believes in home industries. It has vendettas enough of its own and will not tolerate any imported articles from Sicily.

The liar may prosper on his credit capital for a time, but truth and fair dealing make an investment which is decidedly more substantial in the long run.

The German Bundesrath is now considering the proposition to repeal the prohibition placed on the American hog. It does not matter a great deal whether our German neighbors remove the prohibition on our pork or not, as we have an abundant market for the same elsewhere.

J. Charles Jones has resigned the office of Deputy County Clerk in Judge Van Fleet's department, and has removed to San Francisco, where he will engage in the practice of law. Mr. Jones made a most efficient court clerk, and won the esteem of the members of the bar and his fellow officers. Their best wishes for his future success accompany him.

In wandering through the legislative halls looking at the seats of our departed statesmen, the following was suggested:

What mysteries may these desks conceal,
Of private snags and public weal,
A damage suit, a hoodie deal,
And various forms of public steal.
If these could say just what they feel,
'Twould make the average "heeler" heel.

Envious people can never reach the goal of true happiness. Success is also beyond their reach. We have practical illustrations of these sentiments during the last session of the Legislature in this State. Envy and jealous feelings towards their fellows caused the cloud of oblivion to fall upon some of our hitherto distinguished citizens. Generous impulses are the safest capital for public men. Wealth does not at all times serve as the lever to foist men into exalted positions.

A man never outgrows the ability of making a fool of himself. Some of our public men are living examples of this fact. When he imagines himself the sharpest and smartest, is the time he is realizing the sentiments here expressed: There are people who had a great deal rather be the whistle or the bell on a steam engine than to be one of the driving-wheels. A man cannot always tell what is the right thing to do, but he can come near telling every time what is the wrong thing.

Hon. John B. Reddick, President of the Senate of California, has made a most excellent presiding officer. There is nothing of a haughty nature about him, yet possessed of firmness and decision in his composition. Mr. Reddick is a man of the people, social and genial, with a smile and kind word for all; yet firm in his adherence to duty, knew neither friends nor enemies, when called upon to decide the important questions that arose before him in the Senate. The most ultra of the opposition partisan, as well as his party associates, join in their praise of President Reddick.

The Act repealing Section 337 of the Penal Code has passed, and is now in the hands of the Governor. This was a useless as well as absolutely inconsistent provision of the codes. Indeed, its inconsistency is apparent when it made the attempt to license the games prohibited in Section 330, a felony, while the original Act is only a misdemeanor. The gaming prohibitions are the same as before, except that the last Legislature amended Section 330 so as to confer jurisdiction on police and justices' courts, in place of making this class of offenses examination cases. We trust Governor Markham will not hesitate in approving the repeal of Section 337.

The members of the bar of this city are careless of the respect due departed brothers of the profession. There is no class of men who should be closer in their friendship. We have observed for a number of years past that on the demise of a brother lawyer, a few members of the bar meet and adopt some cold and formal resolutions, and at the funeral obsequies rarely more than half a dozen attorneys are present to pay the last tribute of respect to the deceased brother. The fact that an attorney has grown old, weary and worn with service prior to passing away, should be an additional reason for marked respect to his memory. Simply because member of the bar has been less successful in acquiring an abundance of the world's goods than his more fortunate fellow, ought not to deter the profession as a body, from devoting a brief moment in attending the last sad rites. It seems cold and heartless to allow a brother attorney to be borne to his last resting place without the presence of his former associates in the honored and honorable circle. We give this gentle reminder and admonition, hoping that in the future there will be something more of brotherly feeling and action.

When a rich man sits down to draft his will it behooves him to give heed to the solemn reflection that, although he was never suspected of insanity during his life, there is no telling what may happen after he is dead.

News arrives from Paris that the French vintners have resolved to advance the price of champagne 12½ francs per dozen. The reason assigned for the advance is that they apprehend considerable damage to the future vintages from the ravages of the phylloxera. The true cause is probably to be found in the failure of the New Jersey apple crop.

That was an amusing procession we saw yesterday going down J street. It was headed by a youngster about seven years old, playing a march, with variations, on his harmonica. The procession consisted of Ed. F. Smith, Secretary of the State Agricultural Society. Mr. Smith marched along, keeping step to the music of the youthful solo band, perfectly oblivious to surroundings until accosted by a friend at Second and J streets. When the spell was broken, Mr. Smith remarked: "Well, that youngster is a marvel, I have followed him five blocks, wondering how such a little elf could master time to such a degree."

A Louisiana planter, one of the first families, went out to Arkansas hunting "niggers" to do his work. He came across a colored man with his family, and insisted that he was under contract to work for him. The negro disclaimed any such contract, and the right of any one to control his actions in this free country. This declaration was too much for the southern blood, whereupon the alleged "first family" man shot the "damned nigger" through the head, killing him instantly. After this act, this "first family" man jocosely remarked, "this is the only way to stop the nigger stampede to other places." No arrests were made, as it was only a nigger killing.

Judge Cravens has sent a communication to the Board of City Trustees stating that his office is without many needed law books, and asking that the city furnish the Court a set of the California Reports and the Codes. The request is eminently proper. This is rather a large city; it is growing larger yearly; the business of the Municipal Court is important; it cannot be properly transacted with justice to the people if there be not at hand the books at least which are found necessary in the office of every lawyer. It should not be expected that a Court in a city of the size of Sacramento can be properly conducted if there are not at hand legal books that are constantly referred to. Judge Cravens' administration is excellent, and he should be accorded all needed aids by the city. His decisions and judgments are carefully considered, and in no case have been disturbed by the higher Courts; that he is regarded as a terror by the criminal element concerns not the law abiding citizen, save that it is for public benefit, and he should be encouraged.

The Rev. J. H. Willey, of Syracuse, gave the manuscript of a recent sermon of his to a reporter of the Standard newspaper of that city for the purpose of making an abstract of the discourse for publication. The manuscript said of John Wesley that "though only a Presbyter, he himself ordained Thomas Coke to the office of the Episcopacy." Willey's penmanship was so bad, however, that the reporter made out this statement to mean and read "though only a Presbyterian he himself ordained his cook to the office of the Episcopacy." Mr. Willey rightly thinks the Standard man was suffering from a bad spell. He is especially of this impression when he finds that the expression "storied urn or animated bust" was made "ornamated hust," while "facial upheavals" was given for "social upheavals;" "bells of the horses" was made to read "heels of the horses," and other little things of that kind. Some manuscript of Dr. Talmage's came to a newspaper office at one time in which occurred the words: "My text finds our Lord;" words which the intelligent compositor, to whom the dominie's manuscript looked like a journey which an inebriated fly had made across the surface of a gridiron struck by lightning, rendered: "My tall friend, our Lord." Proof reading was fortunately trustworthy. Horace Greeley was frequently annoyed by errors which did not get corrected. "'Tis true, 'tis pity; pity 'tis, 'tis true," was once written by him, only to become printed as "'Tis two, 'tis fifty; yes, 'tis fifty-two," while "William H. Seward" was made "Richard the Third" and "reconstruction" got twisted into "recrudescence." Things are not always what they seem.

It is not generally known that Henry VIII of England hanged no fewer than 72,000 robbers, thieves and vagabonds, and that "Good Queen Bess" was, in the latter part of her reign, responsible for the slaughter of 360 or 400 criminals yearly. Turning to the year 1566, for example, we find that in the county of Somerset alone 40 persons were executed, 35 burned in the hand, and 37 severely whipped.

California Legislatures.

The twenty-ninth session of the Legislature has reached its close. Its history is but a repetition of that of its predecessors. Since the beginning of the State government the retiring Legislature has been considered the worst, and it has always been that at the opening of a session the Press complimented the personnel of the bodies, and predicted advantageous results from their deliberations. Such favorable comment is naturally expected, for, in the early stage, measures of importance, as a rule, do not arise, and the members who are prone to be vicious have no opportunity to lay their wires. It is unjust to condemn bodies composed of 120 men as an entirety, because there happen to be among them a few who are dishonest, and a slight sprinkling of unmitigated fools—men who lose sight of important State measures and waste their energies to accomplish reforms extremely petty in their nature. It seems, however, that the people are disposed that every element of society shall in some way be represented, and as a rule the association of cranks have their delegates. We generally have a man with the hobby of "Woman's Suffrage," about whose desk the oppressed women gather. Then there is the dyspeptic member with whom "beer" does not set well, and his mission is to down the "well" and prevent the robust members from getting a "toddy" in the Capitol building. Then again there is one who believes that a woman should not be employed as a clerk and should not be afforded the opportunity to make a living. He is willing to compromise, however, on perhaps so broad a ground as that the woman shall not have red hair or addicted to chewing gum.

Various Legislatures have been facetiously characterized. The first one was called "The Legislature of a thousand drinks." That they earned that appellation is doubtless correct, but they did better work than any of their successors. They elected two Federal Senators without the taint of "hoodie," and if it can be said any undue influence was exercised, it was through the lavish dispensation of wine, whisky and cigars. Subsequently the element of deceit figured largely in senatorial elections. We had the scandals of the Gwin-Broderick contests; the subsequent betrayal of Broderick by Gwin, and the lamentable killing of Broderick. Later on occurred the historical wardrobe episode in the Golden Eagle hotel. Afterward much was said concerning the events surrounding the election of Senator Casserly. Notwithstanding all these circumstances, California has been more than fairly represented in the upper House of Congress, and with none of the many scandals at Washington has a California Senator been implicated or even suspected. It is regrettable that the selection to fill the Hearst vacancy could not have been made until after a disgraceful exhibition of deceit and treachery, and a shading of corruption. However, it is gratifying that no taint is possible to be attached to Senator Felton. The position of Mr. Estee does not strike us with favor. For a gentleman aspiring to an office of such dignity, it looks bad that he should have been so conveniently present in the State Library and have made the sensational discovery of the paper scraps in the waste basket. The members of the Legislature doubtless viewed the matter as we do, for the final vote was very significant. There were matters connected with the Bruner investigation that were exceedingly discreditable. The course of the Examiner throughout was hardly what could have been expected from a journal of its assumed standing, and the publicity given the majority report in advance of its presentation, cannot be justified as being a matter of duty; it evidenced a malignity that illy became a member of the State Assembly, and we regard it but just that the minority report was adopted. The general work of the Legislature, however, is satisfactory, and several very important measures have become laws.

Passing Away.

During the past week three of the pioneers of Sacramento crossed the dark river to join the millions that have gone before. Dr. W. S. Manlove died at his home near Brighton, Judge John Heard at his residence in this city, and D. W. Welty in the State of Washington. They were all representative men, and each had held high and honorable political positions in Sacramento county.

'Tis beauty doth oft make woman proud; 'tis virtue that doth make them most admired; 'tis modesty that makes them seem divine.—Shakespeare.

The less we find fault, the more happiness.

A man in the wrong is the first to get angry.

The man who has never felt anger is certainly fit for a saint.

The poet says:—"They who forgive the most shall be most forgiven." The Sacramento public must be booked for a reserved seat in Paradise. We have forgiven much in the past, and will have to do so in the future.

A CURE FOR LOVE.

Take 12 ounces of Dislike, 1 pound of Resolution, 2 grains of Common Sense, 2 ounces of Experience, a large sprig of time, and 3 quarts of cooling water of Consideration.

Set these over the gentle fire of Love, sweeten with the spoon of Forgetfulness, skim it with the spoon of Melancholy, put in the bottom of your heart, cork it with the cork of a clear Conscience, let it remain and you will quickly find ease and be restored to your senses again.

These things can be had of the Apothecary at the home of Understanding next door to Reason, on Prudent Street, in the village of Contentment.

A Prosperous City.

We feel a pride in the present conduct of the municipal affairs of Sacramento. The past year has been one of prosperity, and when we look back at what has been accomplished within the past year there is much for congratulation. We have a modern electric line of street railway, over which each car travels daily 120 miles. Electric motors are in operation. That we will constantly have improvements in this line of power can reasonably be expected. Enough has been manifested to warrant the belief that the managements of these enterprises will keep full pace with the times.

Since the rainy season of 1889-90 many miles of streets have been graveled and permanently improved. This work will be prosecuted until no fault can be found with our highways. The era of unsightly awnings is fast passing away, and our business streets are assuming a look of "business." It will not be long before the sidewalks will all be of substantial cement. It is true, the burden to property-holders has been onerous, but it has been borne without complaint, and there has been manifested a disposition to abandon the road of apathy we have traveled in the past.

Since the last election the members of the Board of Trustees have discarded the unseemly Monday matinees that did not reflect credit to the good taste and dignity of members of that body. It is but a suggestion on our part, but we do hope when important matters arise the Board will settle them in caucus, and amicably, and not in a wordy warfare in public.

There has been some talk concerning the election of the City Treasurer, and from some quarters it would seem there was a disposition to make a change, not because of the matter of the fitness of the present incumbent, or the fact that the depositing of the public funds may be of advantage to a bank, but because the issue of the selection of the Treasurer has entered too largely into city and county politics. The intrusion of this matter into local politics is to be deprecated, and we hope there will be no repetition of it in future. However, that apparent abuses have resulted in the past does not justify a change from which the people only will suffer. True it is, the Constitution prohibits the use of public funds save for the purposes for which they are raised, and contemplates they shall be kept intact and separate from other usages; yet in this city the funds have been deposited in banks and have been in circulation. So long as they are secure, there is benefit in there being so placed, as the people have the advantage, in a measure, of their use as a circulating medium. So far as the present Treasurer, Mr. Gerber, is concerned, we would regard it as a matter of folly to displace him. We are not aware of any man in the city better or as well qualified to fill the office. His administration of the office of Auditor and Recorder of the county was eminently satisfactory. The opportunities he has had as City Treasurer to familiarize himself with the finances of the city, and particularly the status of the funded debt, renders his counsel invaluable. We feel assured the Trustees will regard our public concerns upon strictly business principles, and that in cases where officers have satisfactorily and efficiently performed their duties changes will not be made. They are in a position to act regardless of unsatisfactory political influence. Let them so act, and we are satisfied the people will heartily sustain them.

Trustee McLaughlin deserves great credit for the street, sidewalk and other work done under his supervision. From a statement published the amounts that have been expended on street contracts aggregate $125,097.86, and for street repairs, crosswalks, sprinkling, the drainage, public squares, the levee, etc., $72,430.23. The cost of the improved sidewalk has been about $30,000. It is estimated that about 140,000 square feet of cement sidewalk has been laid in the outer walks, and that there have been placed about 60,000 feet in coping on the inner edge of the sidewalks and in inside walks. In addition to the street work covered by the report published in the daily papers, there are now in course of improvement the following work, which will be completed during the summer: I street, from Thirteenth to Thirty-first; P, from Froht to Thirty-first; J, from Fourteenth to Thirty-first; Fourteenth, from G to L; Teuth, from G to I; Third, from P to R.

An interesting story was recently published about a Milwaukee man who saw a woman fall down in the street and helped her up. She was so grateful that she sent him a deed for a house worth $5,000. A Peoria man, who had read the story, started to help a woman who had slipped on a banana peel, but the result was not the same. The woman yelled to her husband, who was standing near, and he rushed up and broke the would-be helper's nose. In regard to a woman you can't always most generally tell.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Uncle Tom's Cabin will never lose favor in the public. On Monday night, at the Clunie Opera House, a fine rendition of this famous drama will be given, by the strongest company on the road.

The concert for the benefit of Congregation B'nai Israel, on Thursday evening, at the Metropolitan, was a success artistically and financially. While several of the leading numbers had to be omitted on account of illness of the artists, the programme was plenty long enough, and very entertaining.

The Little Tycoon drew a splendid audience last night. There were some changes since the last presentation in this city. It is an amusing production, and the several roles are in excellent hands. The music is catchy and the dramatic and comedy parts are full of wit and sentiment. The Little Tycoon to night.

All the Comforts of a Home filled the Metropolitan to its capacity for two nights. While the idea is novel and the situations amusing, there is really nothing to give the production the prominence it has attained. It is not a meritorious farce comedy, nor is the company up to the average comedy combinations. With the exception of Kate Denin Wilson and Joseph Humphreys, there was not a standard artist in the company. Splendid opportunities are open for fine musical and specialty artists, but none such appeared. First-class prices should not be exacted for mediocrity shows of this class, even though heralded by the praise of newspapers in advance. While we all laugh heartily at the absurdities, few went away satisfied with the performance.

The Peri has vanished from the gates of Paradise, as portrayed on the drop curtain at the Metropolitan. We have so often "poked fun" at the lame and halting Peri, that the owner of the theater at length obliterated the blemish. The artist has replaced the Peri by a flock of doves approaching a couple of cooing doves sitting on the branch of a tree. Just what idea this is intended to convey we are not advised. In place of "Paradise and the Peri," we have Paradise with its swans, birds of Paradise, humming birds, doves, tropical foliage, flowers, lake, etc. It is not entirely certain whether the view presented by the drop curtain is the real Paradise or only the scene immediately outside the gates. Perhaps the real Paradise is left for the spectators' imagination, and is concealed behind the pictured gate. Anyway, the eye is relieved of the moustrosity that did service as the Peri.

The Delsarte System.

Francois Delsarte was born at Solesmes, France, November 11, 1811. His father, a physician, died, leaving his family poor. The young Delsarte was sent to Paris in 1822, to study with a painter on china, but his tastes carried him into other channels. In 1825 he became a pupil of the conservatory, a government institution for instruction in dramatic art, music and the ballet. Here, for the want of proper guidance, he lost his voice. Finding himself thus incapacitated for the stage, he resigned that career for that of a teacher in singing and the dramatic art. Realizing that he had been shipwrecked for want of a compass and pilot, he determined to save others from his fate by seeking and formulating the laws of an art hitherto left to the caprice of mediocrity or the inspiration of genius. After years of unremitting labor and study—study which took him by turns to hospitals, morgues, asylums, prisons, art galleries, etc., patiently unearthing the secrets and methods of past genius—study which kept him enchained by the hour watching the children at play in the great public gardens, weighing humanity everywhere and everyhow, he succeeded in discovering and formulating the laws of aesthetic science. He died without arranging his life work for publication, July 20, 1871.

A Remarkable Family.

In the Harlein MSS., Nos. 980 and 78, in the British Museum, there is an extraordinary fact mentioned, viz.: that a weaver in Scotland had by one wife, a Scotch woman, sixty two children; but only four daughters of these lived to women. Forty-six sons, however, attained their majority. Most of the sons were living in the year 1630 at Newcastle on Tyne, and it was recorded in the old histories of Newcastle that a wealthy gentleman rode thirty miles beyond Edinburgh in order to prove the matter. It is said that Sir J. Bowes adopted ten of the sons, and three other gentlemen also took ten each. The rest were brought up by their parents.

Clerk (in the gas company's office)—"This bill of Wisplet's is entirely too large; he couldn't have consumed so much gas last month."

Bookkeeper—"How do you know?"

Clerk—"Er-um, I ought to know, I am paying my addresses to his daughter."

Shaving Customs, and English American.

There is one rule which Englishmen practice that it would be well for us to adopt when possible. They abhor a barber-shop, and every man makes it a practice to shave before breakfast, which is as much a part of his toilet as washing his hands or combing his hair after rising in the morning. The majority of Englishmen would as soon think of going to breakfast with their hair tousled and untouched by comb or brush as appearing unshaven. Americans, on the contrary, are more or less addicted to barber-shops. Undoubtedly there is good reason for this, for we have the best barbers in the world and the most beautifully appointed shops. But it is incorrect to assume that because a man goes to a barber shop he saves time. To begin with, there is always the danger of not being able to get shaved at all. I know a number of men who make it a point to get down to business early, open their mail, and then go out to get shaved about 10 o'clock. The business of the day has been started, and they feel that they can steal the necessary time to get shaved, but very often a day comes along when a rush of matters demanding attention keeps the business man in his chair until luncheon time, and he puts off the ordeal of shaving until he has barely time to get home to dinner. Hence the type of the unshaven, hurried American. Julien Gordon's reflections are accurate in a way, but she has neglected to take into consideration the great difference in external conditions between this country and England. While the American business man makes it a point to get in his office at 8:45, his English contemporary, of the same business and social position, begins his office work at 10 o'clock. This gives the Englishman an advantage of an extra hour or more in the morning, and as business in England closes much earlier than it does here, there is additional time at the end of the day for further attention to the details of personal attire.—Blakely Hall in Brooklyn Eagle.

Some Enemies We All Prefer.

There are some enemies to be preferred to some friends.

I prefer the open enemy to the friend who considers it a jest to discuss my weaknesses before people who are strangers to me.

I prefer the open enemy to the friend who, because I believe in friendship, uses me as long as it is convenient, and then laughs to other people about how easily I am fooled.

I prefer the open enemy to the friend who comes to me when I'm in my sorrow, hears of my woes, and recounts them to a lot of idle listeners.

I prefer the open enemy to the friend who makes friendship a worry and a trouble rather than a rest and a refreshment.

I prefer the open enemy to the friend who exploits ill temper, ugly words and dissatisfaction upon me, counting that friendship gives these privileges.

I prefer an open enemy always. Then there is honest warfare, not innuendoes, not backbiting, not lying or slandering, but clear, honest war, where you strike out from the shoulder, either mentally or physically, straight. Like you, a good friend or a good enemy may be found in BAB.

I think there are some persons who imagine that there is a sacred quality in a family Bible lying on the center table, and who have the same sort of regard for the book that lies there that some other people have for the value of a horse shoe nailed over the door; and the one is as good as the other. The Bible that is unopened is at best of value only as a respectful profession that you are not exactly an infidel. The Bible that is to lay on you is a Bible that you may lay hold upon.

Two New Jersey young men, enamored of the same girl, have fought a duel. They stood in the middle of one of the mosquito state's highways and pelted each other with handfuls of rich, red New Jersey mud until "satisfaction" was obtained. In some respects the New Jersey code of the duello is far ahead of any others. It is at all events unique and original, and not the least advantage is the inexpensiveness of the weapons, which always lie close at foot and require no trouble in loading.

A genuine case of a man dying from a broken heart was before Dr. Brennan, at the St. Louis morgue, recently. Just before Patrick Connelly, aged thirty-five, died, he exclaimed: "Oh! my mother! my dear mother!" When the heart of Connelly was examined it was found that the apex was elongated and burst. No cause is assigned except grief due to the death of the aged mother of the deceased. The verdict was death caused by a ruptured heart.

Texas has a Hogg for Governor, a Pig for Judge, a Lamb for Senator, a Durham, for Representative, and a Buffalo for Sheriff.

The Two Great Mysteries.

We know not what it is, dear, this sleep so deep and still—
The folded hands, the awful calm, the cheek so pale and chill;
The lids that will not lift again, though we may try and call:
The strange white solitude of peace that settles over all.

We know not what it means, dear, this desolate heart pain—
The dread to take our daily way and walk in it again.
We know not to what sphere the loved who leave us go,
Nor why we're left to wander still, nor why we do not know.

But this we know—our loved and lost, if they should come this day,
Should come and ask us, What is life? not one of us could say.

Life is a mystery, as deep as death can ever be,
Yet oh, how sweet it is to us, this life we live and see!

Then might they say, those vanished ones—and blessed is the thought—
So death is sweet to us, beloved, though we may tell you naught
We may not tell it to the quick, this mystery of death;
Ye may not tell it if ye would, the mystery of breath.

The child that enters life, comes not with knowledge or intent;
So those who enter death must go as little children
Nothing is known, but I believe that God is overhead;
And as life is to the living, so death is to the dead.

DIFFICULTIES.

"Yes, Tom, you heard the rights of the story; some one did cry out, 'I forbid the banus!'"

"That was a nice fix to be in, I can tell you, at that late hour. Bessy and I in church, with Miss Spicer, the old General's daughter, for bridesmaid, and John Charles, a particular nobby fellow, who stood up as best man. There was Bessy, as pretty as a picture, dressed in as handsome a bridal outfit as ever you saw—white satin and lace and flowers and veil. I'm not much at description about a woman's rig, but I vow and declare, though I've seen many of 'em since, I've never come across a bride as all-fired pretty as she was, and I never shall."

"I didn't want to be married in church—it looked sort of conspicuous—but Bessy wouldn't be married any other way, and I wanted Bessy."

"Well, the minister, a very tall, grave-looking man, standing on the other side of the rail, had just begun the service, and says he, 'if any man has any reasons why,' and so forth—you know what it is—'let him now speak, or forever after hold his tongue,' when up jumps somebody in the back of the house and cries out:

"I forbid the banus!"

"Well, that was a pretty kettle of fish to begin with. I felt Bessy tremble, and I grew hot all over. If the old man, her father, a queer old codger, had taken it into his head that Bessy was too good for me—and, indeed, I don't deny she was—I was done for. But then that couldn't be. The minister he turned red, and the people who had come to see were in a state of restlessness, you may be sure."

"For what reason do you forbid the banus?" asked he of the white gown. All this passed much quicker than I can write it."

"Because she is already my wife."

"Says I, 'That's a lie!' and her father repeated it with an amendment that was not exactly appropriate to the place—and in a moment there was a pretty how d'ye do. I had made my way to the back of the church, and if I had laid hands on that fellow he'd never see the outside of his skin again. I'd have torn him in pieces. But there was a crowd; some pointed out one and some another; and one man gravely told me the villain had gone home to get the proofs. Then Bessy, frightened out of her wits on missing me, screamed, and fainted away, and of course the minister couldn't have gone on anyhow. Bessy's mother began scolding me, and Bessy's father ripped round there, all but swearing in the very face of the parson, till I surely thought that the last day come and we all had gone crazy together. So we had to go back, everybody mad, Bessy in hysterics, and the old folks storming at her, at me, and each other. Upon my word, Tom, you'd have pitied me, or any other man, for what was I to do? A shur had been cast upon Bessy, poor, innocent child, and even I, who had been her lover less than six months, didn't know what to think of the statement so boldly made before all Israel and the sun."

"Well, of course, it got into the papers, and all manner of comments were made, which nearly drove me distracted. What to do we didn't know. Bessy's aunt, a regular old Tabby, declared it was the worst of bad luck to have a marriage put off, and abused me like a pickpocket. The wedding breakfast stayed for two days untasted, while Bessy's father and myself went tearing round the city to find the man who had set all the trouble going; it was like hunting for a needle in a haystack."

"Meantime, poor little Bessy was sick with low, nervous fever. I went there every day to inquire about her and muse upon the uncertainty of mundane affairs generally, when one morning the door was opened before I had reached the top step, a big, red hand pulled me inside, and the whole household began an Indian dance, including everything but scalps and the warwhoops."

"Bulger, my glorious fellow, we're all right!" shouted the old gentleman, giving me such a slap between the shoulders that I lost my breath."

"My dear boy, our sorrows are at an end," sniffed the almost mother-in-law."

"I hope it won't be put off again, for then we should have a funeral," remarked the Tabby aunt, looking at me from under her spectacles with her usual severity of expression."

"What! you haven't found—' cried I, utterly unable to finish from sheer bewilderment."

"Yes, we've found him!" said the paternal."

"The poor, miserable wretch!" ejaculated the maternal."

"Ought to be roasted alive," muttered Tabby, glaring at me."

"Jo," cried a weak voice at the head of the stairs, 'come up here.'"

"You may guess how those stairs disappeared from under my feet. Poor Bessy, pale little thing, fell into my arms without any fuss, and cried—and cried—and cried. Then, after all this commotion was over—and it didn't kill me—my beaming father-in-law that should have been at that time, handed me a paper, with the brief remark, 'Read!' And this is what I read:

"A lunatic, from G., in the county of M—, has been at large for a month, but was last night tracked to his hiding place in this city and taken back to the asylum. It seems, from the accounts we can gather, that he has been leading an eventful life since his escape, having personated successfully, a Member of Congress, the Governor of a State and a bank president. He is evidently a genius; and is highly delighted with his tour. One exploit of which he boasts—for, singularly enough, he remembers his pranks—was that of spoiling a wedding. The circumstances will be remembered, and we are most happy to make matters smooth again for our esteemed fellow-citizens, J. B. — and C. L. —, also the charming bride, whose maiden meditations were so ruthlessly and painfully broken in upon. We congratulate them as heartily as if the wedding were consummated, and when it is may be there to see."

"Well, you better believe it wasn't long before that wedding came off, but we didn't risk it in a church again. And we might have admitted the traditional 500 friends, for we had become celebrities; but Bessy wanted a quiet wedding, averring as a reason that among 500 people there must of necessity be one or more lunatics. Miss Spicer was gracious and stood up with us again, but John Charles had taken his departure to realms unknown, so we had to put up with an ordinary man. The wedding came off this time without an interruption; and don't fail to look in on us, Tom, and wish us joy."

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of Edwin C. Barclay, an insolvent debtor. Edwin C. Barclay having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said Edwin C. Barclay is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the county of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal of the said Edwin C. Barclay, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the county of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court room of said Court, on the 10th day of April, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M., of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS a newspaper of general circulation published in the county of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. Dated, February 25th, 1891.

A. P. CATLIN, Judge of the Superior Court. FRANK D. RYAN, Attorney for Petitioner. f28-6t

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to DAVID KIZER, greeting: You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 29th day of January, 1891, in which action, Annie Kizer is plaintiff, and you are defendant. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of said Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between plaintiff and defendant on the grounds of desertion and failure to provide; also, for the care, custody and control of the minor children, the issue of said marriage, viz: Nettie and Edna, aged 5 years, and 15 months respectively, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made; and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL.] and affix the seal of said Court, this 29th day of January A. D. 1891.

ESTATE OF SARAH MORRIS, DECEASED.— Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, administrator of the estate of Sarah Morris, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against said deceased, to exhibit them, with the necessary affidavits or vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to Thomas Lewis, administrator of the estate of said deceased, at the office of S. THOMAS LEWIS, Administrator of the Estate of Sarah Morris, Dec'd. S. SOLON HOLL, Attorney for Administrator. m10-4

A newly-married young farmer living at Greenbush, near Sheboygan, has hit upon a novel and effective scheme for getting his wife out of bed in the morning. He fills the stove with damp shavings, lights them and then shuts the damper in the pipe. By the time he reaches the barn she is effectually smoked out.

Women who want their husbands to care for them should never cry. A homely woman looks pretty and attractive when she laughs at a man's faults; a pretty woman looks homely when she cries over them. This is selfish, no doubt, but look among any of your married acquaintances, and you will find that the woman whose husband thinks the most of her is the one who laughs where other women would cry.

Most persons in this country pronounce phthisis "tee-sis"; yet among eight lexicographical authorities quoted by Webster not one gives this pronunciation, the predominant one being "this-sis." Only one authority (Smart) calls it "tisis," a pronunciation prevalent in Boston. Our esteemed leguminophagous colleagues cannot, therefore, put on any airs, other than those legitimately resulting from their strong east winds.

IF A BODY MEET A BODY

the result is a collision, whether "coming thro' the rye," or not. Life is full of collisions. We are constantly colliding with somebody or something. If it isn't with our neighbors it is with some dread diseases that "knocks us off the track" and perhaps disables us for life. Women especially it seems, have to bear the brunt of more collisions and afflictions than mankind. In all cases of nervousness, bearing-down sensations, tenderness, periodical pains, sick headache, congestion, inflammation, or ulceration and all "female irregularities" and "weaknesses," Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription comes to the rescue of women as no other medicine does. It is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money paid for it will be refunded. How the Participants Talk it Over.

A singular pair were chatting together last night in the corridor of the Hoffman House, says the New York Continental. One was Gen. Fitz Hugh Lee and the other Gen. W. W. Averill, the gallant trooper of the Federal forces in the late war. While the Confederate officer has gone into public life since the conflict, the Federal General has turned to business affairs. As they met last night both were in exceeding good humor, and started in to talk of their combats during the unpleasantness.

"Let me see," said Averill, it is twenty-eight years ago the 17th of this month since we had a slight misunderstanding at Kelley's Ford, when the battle bearing that name was fought on the Rapidan. You were mighty vigorous in those days, and kept well to the front. Things have changed with both of us since those days; but how the old times do come back to me."

Gen. Lee smiled, and said: "Yes, General, I remember those busy and eventful days, and I love to talk them over, especially with my opponents. There is much in them of which all of us may feel proud, serious as were the consequences of war, and strangely as its edicts separated the men whose lives had for years run in the same direction."

"Yes, General," continued Averill, "there is much to be proud of, as well as to make us sad. Do you remember, about twenty-eight years ago to night, you swooped down on my picket lines, broke up my rest and captured 80 or too of my men? It was an impolite proceeding which we would hardly relish in these days. We were young then, and a disturbance at night or in the day did not bother us much. I could not help remembering, however, that this is the anniversary of our contentions."

These two commanders of cavalry divisions that were almost constantly opposed to each other during the war, laughed heartily as they recalled the memorable incidents. Both Lee and Averill were in the same class at West Point. Both were stationed at Carlisle as young officers when the war broke out, and both were from the same State, Virginia.

Interesting About the Planets.

There has been a great deal said and astronomers especially have made efforts to fathom the mysteries surrounding the planets. Arguments have been advanced for and against the adaptability of life to the conditions of other worlds, but nothing has been determined. As there is no positive proof, we are at liberty to suppose the planets are inhabited and that the other worlds are more or less like our own. Moons and suns were once supposed to be nebulae—a mass of incandescence or glowing gas floating in space, endowed with a kind of whirlpool motion. The planets were formed by condensation of rings of matter successively thrown off by the central mass and the satellites by the condensation of matter thrown off in like manner by their primaries, the central mass (sun) remaining, acting not unlike a magnet, holding the planets in place and forming what is known as the solar system. Hence their similarity. The planets being much smaller, comparatively insignificant in size to the sun, evidently have gone through the process of creation, excepting probably the larger ones—for instance Jupiter, which exceeds the earth in bulk 1400 times, and is supposed to be still in the process of creation. At present the greatest interest is directed toward Mars, being one of the inferior planets nearest to us and presenting an excellent view. Scientific research, with the aid of the telescope, can trace out land and water, and having an atmosphere like the earth the conditions are favorable for both animal and vegetable life to exist. The extraordinary lights seen at intervals may be electric storms similar to those that occur on the earth. If the remarkable process in science continues in the future as it has in the past (as yet astronomy is but in its infancy) time alone will reveal to us astonishing results, incomprehensible to the ignorant, but gratifying to the intelligent.

Golden Thoughts.

Mind and character are acted upon in proportion as they act from within. They are gainers just so far as they are givers. They receive in proportion to their outlay. In the realm of knowledge and of character, passive reception is no reception. Only as a learner becomes a teacher does he really learn. Only as he who is within the range of influence begins to influence others, is he himself truly influenced. It is by a man's arousing himself to tell of what he has heard or read that he makes the information thus available to him his permanent possession. Not he who has had best opportunities of learning, or of being rightly influenced, but he who has been most active and persistent in making available to others the good which has come to him, is the man who is the truest gainer from instruction and influence. Not only is it more blessed to give than to receive, but there is no other way so sure of receiving as by giving. Income in mind and character is measured by outgoing; and that which is imparted is the measure of that which is retained.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.

We resolved sometime ago to desist from saying anything further concerning our city debt, or mentioning the facts which have brought such dire distress upon our tax-ridden people. We were actuated in this course because it appeared impossible to dispel the illusions thrown upon the alleged "leading citizens" by the President of the Funded Debt Commission. His sophistries are so powerful, that reason had no place in their minds or councils. But this "great financier" is not content to rest upon the power he has wielded, and the destructions that has followed his visionary scheme, he must, perforce, persist in abusing all who have independence of thought and reason, even after he has convinced committees of the Board of Trade that his plans have worked wonders towards ameliorating the financial straits of the city. It might be a charity to suggest that this subject has become an absolute mania—a mild, though not harmless form of mental aberration, with the author of the great financial scheme. Several articles from his pen have appeared recently in the Evening News, which are so glaringly absurd, that a brief reply is necessary to remind the thinking and reasoning public of some of the true facts concerning the operations of his disastrous scheme.

We will be pardoned if it becomes necessary to refer briefly to a little ancient history relating to our "Old Man of the Sea." As to the funding plan, it was founded on the old exploded William Pitt law of over a hundred years ago, which was opposed by Charles James Fox, and when put in operation came near bankrupting the Bank of England. But in 1872, this "financier" caused the experiment to be tried by this city. Now, prior to that time, the bonded debt was in round figures about $1,600,000, and was worth in the market from 15 to 20 cents on the dollar. In other words, the value of the debt in cash was something over $300,000. As positive evidence of this fact, Governor Stanford, the late Henry Miller, and the late Mark Hopkins formed a trust fund of $300,000 with which was contemplated the purchase of the entire debt, and to hold it for the benefit of the city. Unfortunately, before this worthy plan was consummated, Mr Miller died, and the plan was abandoned. We refer to this circumstance for the purpose of showing what was the real value of our outstanding obligations in the judgment of such men of financial abilities.

It was known by the holders of these bonds that they were greatly in excess of any real indebtedness, and that the scrip upon which the bonds were issued was given for four or five times the true value of the services performed and supplies furnished the city. That is to say, when a man worked on the streets or levees for $5 per day, so uncertain was his pay, that scrip was issued for $20 for that day. These facts rendered the market price of the city bonds at the figures given above. Thus, in 1872, when the Funded Debt plan was inaugurated, the whole debt could have been liquidated for less than $400,000, interest and all. Now, for the workings of this great scheme. As soon as the bond holders found out the true inwardness of this plan, the price of bonds advanced to 35 cents on the dollar, making the cash value of the debt about $600,000.

As time advanced, and as this Commission bought up bonds and coupons with the people's money, the debt increased accordingly. At this time the city has paid over one million dollars in interest, not including what has been paid to the Funded Debt Commission otherwise, and the debt is now about $1,500,000. Thus, for what could have been purchased for less than $400,000 prior to the adoption of the Funding Act of 1872, is now at the par value of over a million and a half, not including over a million cash paid out by the city.

Our theory at that time and at this, was to depreciate the value of the bonds, in place of advancing the same. The practical effect of this funding plan has been to advance our obligations to par. The plausible sophistries used by the author of the plan, and which seems to have taken deep root in the minds of our "leading citizens," are based on the fact that for a comparative small sum of money this Commission secured a large amount of bonds and coupons, and was thereby enabled to speculate upon the remaining obligations at a discount. This itself proves that if there had never been any such plan, the commercial value of the bonds would have remained at a very low figure. The very act of creating a speculative fund made the bonds a marketable commodity, and which has at this time raised them to par value. But since this state of affairs has been accomplished there would be no particular objection to the Commission continuing in its little discount brokerage business, was it not for the fact that the President of that Board is constantly meddling with the governmental affairs of the city, and insisting upon foisting his peculiar and doubtful schemes upon the public. As a matter of fact, it makes very little difference to the taxpayers whether the money is paid to the Funded Debt Commission on coupons or directly to the other bond holders. The city has to pay it any way. When paid to the Funded Debt Commission it is discounted a few cents, and ultimately goes to the bondholders; the difference to the city being perhaps 5 or 6 per cent.

But, as said before, this can do no harm if confined to that department alone. We are confronted, however, at all times by this "great financier" when any attempt is made to lessen the burden of taxation, or to relieve ourselves from the weight of the debt. Indeed, the first formidable litigation was virtually instigated by the President of the Commission, to enforce the levy of the full one per cent taxes under the Act of 1858. Then he caused suits to be instituted against the city on behalf of the Funded Debt Commission, for payment of coupons, and also to enforce the levy of an additional tax, for the use of the Commission. When the litigation concerning the payment of coupons, barred by the statute of limitations, had been decided adversely by our Supreme Court, directly antagonistic to a long line of decisions by the Federal Supreme Court, he influenced Mayor John Q. Brown, who was then a member of the Funded Debt Commission, to abandon the appeal to the Federal Supreme Court on the theory that the Commission would be deprived of a few thousand dollars in barred coupons held by it.

After the city paid out $400,000 on barred coupons, which furnished our creditors with funds to fight the city more easily, the light dawned on Mayor Brown that there was something wrong in our "great financier's" methods, which resulted in a break between them and the resignation of the Mayor from the Commission. It was at this time that Mayor Brown changed his tactics, and resolved to fight the bondholders and their great ally, the Funded Debt Commission. It was too late, however, to accomplish much before the power of the bonded creditors was felt in the defeat of Mayor Brown and the writer in the control of the official power of the city. The silent yet siren influence of the bond creditors was all powerful in political circles, as was evidenced by this fact. At all stages of this city litigation, the President of the Funded Debt Commission has been active in impressing upon the courts that the people of Sacramento were repudiators; which had the effect of prejudicing the courts against us, and very many of the adverse decisions were doubtless prompted by these representations. The great error of Mayor Brown was in listening to this "great financier," and in not pressing our meritorious appeals to the Federal Supreme Court; and which he would have done had the breach between himself and this gentleman occurred sooner.

When the needs of the city demanded a new organic law, and the people urged the adoption of a new charter, the power of the "great financier" was exercised in gaining an adverse decision from those self-constituted guardians of our welfare, the Board of Trade, because it might happen that the people, who understood the situation, would not continue the Funded Debt Commission as part of the political government of the city. Then came that disastrous decision of a bare majority of the Supreme Court, taking 55 per cent of the gross receipts from water rents for the benefit of the creditors. Here again we found the hand of the President of the Funded Debt Commission raised against the city. All attempts to relieve us from the effects of this great disaster are antagonized by his influence. A few thousand dollars more are placed in the hands of that Commission, which is the only excuse for this action. The welfare of the taxpayer is not considered; the bondholders' demands must be first complied with. In fact, every act and thought of this man seems to be for the creditors, although he has the temerity to pose as the friend of the people, and has successfully imbued "leading citizens" with his peculiar ideas. He is not content with these disastrous results, but must, perforce, accuse all who entertain independent ideas not in accord with his, as dishonest repudiators.

We ask, in this light of the facts, "Who has cost the city a million of dollars?" Echo answers, "The evil policy pursued by this 'great financier.'" Much has been said and written about the costs of our bonded litigation. This has ever been held up as a great "bugbear" to prevent those in authority from defending the people's rights against the unjust demands of the creditors. It is true there was a perfect avalanche of suits instituted in several counties of this State, including Yuba, San Mateo, Alameda, Santa Clara, San Francisco and Sacramento. The writer, who was the attorney for the city in each and all of them, defended many alone, and was assisted by able counsel in others. Without going into details, a round estimate of the entire cost of all this litigation in the past ten years did not amount to $5000. Some are dreadfully alarmed at the possible cost of a renewal of the litigation concerning the unjust appropriation of 55 per cent of the gross revenue from water rents. What would a few hundred dollars' costs amount to, considering the benefits that would accrue in the event of a reversal of this absurd decision. It is a mistaken policy to submit to the dictation of the President of the Funded Debt Commission if he did succeed in defeating friendly legislation this winter. The law as it stands, in the light of the interpretation put upon it by such splendid legal minds as Justices McFarland and Patterson, is sufficient to warrant a retrial of the issue. We say once for all, throw off the spell that this "great financier" has put upon the city.

Written for THEMIS.]

How the World Treats Its Benefactors.

The uncompromising opposition which the mass of mankind have exhibited to the march of improvement and reform, in moral, mental, and physical science, forms a curious subject for speculation. Inveterate prejudice and narrow-minded intolerance have dogged the steps of genius at every turn, frowning on the simple product of inventive skill, and often compelling the student of nature to renounce his own glorious discoveries to escape a violent death. Even when science has allied itself with philanthropy, and sought only to elevate and bless the race, the result has been scarcely more favorable. Old habits and deep-rooted prejudices are the most discouraging of all obstacles. They resist alike the claims of justice and the importunities of mercy. The difficulties which nature places in the pathway of human progress, often taxing to the utmost powers of genius, are, after all, surmounted with greater ease than the barriers thrown in the way of science by ignorance and its gloomy sister, bigotry. The world has always hated new truths, new discoveries, new inventions. Sighing "for the good old days of Adam and Eve," it has persecuted with inquisitorial cruelty those who were seeking new light; or, at best, left them to toil on in obscurity, their services unappreciated till after they have smoldered in the grave. What folios might be filled with illustrations of this remark! We have collected a few facts from history to show what the character of such a work would be; but in an article like the present we can enter only upon the threshold of the subject.

The histories of many of the greatest discoveries that have burst upon the world are but a record of fear and sufferings on the one side, and persecution on the other. When Nicholas Copernicus, after twenty years of intense study, was able to demonstrate to his own mind the fallacies of the Ptolemaic system of the universe, he concealed his work through fear, and was imprisoned by the Pope for the purpose of compelling a recantation of his "absurd dogmas." Galileo was twice brought before the Inquisition for upholding the doctrines of Copernicus, and twice compelled to abjure them. When Harvey discovered the circulation of the blood, it is said that not a physician in England over forty years of age would believe it; and no ridicule was too great for the propounder of such an absurdity. Harvey himself, when he had grown old, refused to admit the discovery of the absorbents by Vesalius.

Great advancements have been made in medical science within a few centuries, but every step forward has been stoutly resisted by ignorance and prejudice. When Jenner attempted to introduce vaccination, he was opposed in the bitterest manner, even by physicians. Cases were published in which vaccinated persons became covered with hair, and exhibited horns and a tail; and that of a child was cited, whose natural disposition was so brutified that it ran on all fours, bellowing like a bull. Jenner was ridiculed in various publications; squibs and satires were resorted to in order to prejudice the public mind against vaccination. He was caricatured riding on a cow. When Ambrose Pare, some three hundred years ago, proposed to shut up the bleeding vessels, in cases of amputation, by tying them with slender ligatures, he was bitterly decried and denounced for attempting an innovation upon the old and cruel practice of cutting limbs with red-hot knives, or scorching over the raw wound with a heated iron, or plunging it into boiling pitch, by which the same end had previously been secured. "The College of Physicians of Paris," says Dr. Simpson, of Edinburgh, "attacked Pare for his proposed new practice. They attempted, by the authority of the French Parliament, to suppress the publication and dissemination of his observations; and for nearly a century afterward, some of the hospital surgeons of Paris continued, with the characteristic obstinacy of the profession, to prefer cauterizing bleeding arteries, rather than simply tie them after the manner of a few ignorant and presumptuous moderns." "Without" writes Mr. John Bell, "without reading the books of these old surgeons, it is not possible to imagine the horrors of the cautery, nor how much reason Pare had for upbraiding the surgeons of his own time with their cruelties. The horrors of the patient, and his ungovernable cries, the hurry of the operators and assistants, the sparkling of the (heated) irons, and the hissing of the blood against them, must have made terrible scenes, and surgery must in those days have been a horrid trade."

The same is true of many of the moral reforms of the last century. When Wilberforce began to work and pray daily for the abolition of the slave trade, he was looked upon somewhat as a good-natured fool; but he pressed the measure with a perseverance which knew no discouragement; he was met by argument, eloquence and ridicule. One member of Parliament declared that, "so far from abolishing the slave trade, it ought to be increased; and that if slavery had never before existed in the world, it ought to be begun now." One gentleman, Sir W. Young, defended slavery on the ground that it had produced some of the greatest men among the ancients. So, also, when the institutions of the Magdalen was first proposed in England, the scheme was met—will it be credited?—by this grave objection: "That the institution would at length totally prevent a vice which every wise government had thought fit to tolerate for the prevention of greater evils." When attention was directed to the barbarous English law against high treason in 1813, the principal argument against abrogation was that it "had been established for centuries; had existed from time immemorial." And what shall we say of Gibbon, the first of English historians, who, in his later years, evinced his intense hatred of innovations by arguing in favor of retaining the Inquisition, with its tortures and its tyranny, because it was an ancient institution! His opposition to Christianity, it has been asserted, sprang from the same roof. "The Christian faith was a bold and successful innovation, and Gibbon hated all innovations."

We might, perhaps, properly include writers and artists among the inventors and discoverers of the world; for the inventive genius may expend itself on the intellectual and ideal, as well as the material. It is well known that poverty and obscurity have been the common fate of authorship in all ages. Not a few of the men whose names now adorn the highest niches in the temple of literature, were literally starved out of the world. They ended their days in obscure garrets, and it was left for posterity to build their tombs and garnish their sepulchres. Little better did it fare with the fathers of painting and sculpture, though the ruse of Rembrandt here occurs to us as a happy relief to the sombre shades of our page. It is recorded that this great artist left Amsterdam in disgust at the poor requital of his labors, and directed his wife to assert that he had died abroad. Crowds flocked to the inconsolable widow, and speculators overbid each other in the purchase of every painting, drawing and sketch by Rembrandt's master hand. The fraud succeeded beyond hope. After little more than a month's absence, the painter returned, and laughed at those who had been duped by his stratagem.

But it is improvement in domestic affairs, and to mechanical and labor-saving inventions, that the world has evinced the fiercest opposition. Illustrations are to be met with on almost every page of history; let us turn a few leaves at a venture. When Dr. Faustus had the temerity to offer for sale in the learned city of Paris a printed book, he was suspected of being in league with the devil, though that book was the Bible, and was obliged to flee the city. To come down to our own day, when in 1814, Mr. Walter, of the London Times, proposed to introduce steam printing, his pressmen threatened destruction to any one whose inventions might suspend their employment—"destruction to him and his traps." When the steam press was first used, Nov. 29, 1814, a police force was in readiness for an outbreak. The journeymen printers of Paris, about the same time, entered into a combination for the purpose of breaking the power presses then lately introduced. In 1830, a paper was issued by nearly five hundred bookbinders of London and Westminster, calling upon their employers to give up the use of the machine for printing books, which relieved the workmen from the only portion of their labor which was sheer drudgery. In 1580, the farmers and maltsters attempted to break down the banks of the river Lea, England, which had been made navigable for a short distance, because their business of land carriage could not compete with the water carriage. Then nearly a century after, when the enormous number of six stage coaches had been put on the road, and turnpikes began to come into use, evils which would necessarily result from this great facility of conveyance, were at once spread broadcast by opposing parties.

When steamboats were first started to Margate, the coach proprietors along the road memorialized Parliament on the subject, showing that their occupation was on the point of being ruined. Then railroads were proposed, and the proposition was received with a perfect storm of opposition and ridicule by the steamboats, and their allies, the canals. The turnpikes and stage coaches also joined in the hue and cry; they were certain of ruin, they thought, if this new scheme should succeed. Treaties were written to demonstrate the danger of traveling faster than nine or ten miles an hour, and it was advised that Parliament should restrict the speed to that rate. Some philosophers argued that a speed of forty miles an hour would cause great difficulty in breathing. The Quarterly Review of 1824, alluding to a proposed railway, says: "But with all these assurances we should as soon expect the people of Woolwick to suffer themselves to be fired off upon one of Congreve's rockets as trust themselves to the mercy of such a machine, going at such a rate. We will back old Father Thames against the Woolwick railway for any sum." When a Dutchman established a saw-mill in England, in 1663, the public outcry against the new fangled machine was so violent that the proprietor was forced to decamp with more expedition than ever did a Dutchman before. The evil was thus kept out of England for many years, but in 1768, an unlucky timber merchant, hoping that after a long time the public would be less watchful of its own interests, made a rash attempt to construct another mill. The guardians of the public welfare, however, were on the alert, and a conscientious mob at once collected and pulled the mill to pieces. When the first turnpike road was constructed in England, the mob broke the tollgates, on account of the tax. When Rev. William Lea, in 1589, invented a stocking machine, he could get no encouragement for introduction, though none but the very rich were able to wear stockings, their hose being sewed together by the tailor, or their legs covered with bandages of cloth. Lea met with no better success in France, and died at last of a broken heart. In 1753, a machine was invented to spin and reel cotton at one operation, which the inventor showed to his neighbors and then destroyed, through the generous apprehension that it might prove injurious to the poor. When spinning machinery was introduced in Europe, the mills were destroyed in many places, and the manufacture put down for a time. How strikingly in contrast with this ruthless spirit was the conduct of the New Zealander, who burst into tears on witnessing a rope-walk, and perceiving the superiority which Englishmen possessed over his countrymen, in the art of spinning; and of another native who carried back to his country a small hand-mill for grinding corn, which he prized as the greatest of all earthly possessions. The introduction of gas, for the purpose of lighting the streets of London, was resolutely opposed, on the ground that it would exert a deleterious influence on the atmosphere, and the bursting of pipes would be productive of danger. Not more than forty years ago the destruction of farming machinery by agricultural laborers gave rise to serious trouble in Great Britain. And to adduce an illustration from our own history, who has forgotten the incredulity and contempt with which Fulton's first attempt to navigate the Hudson by steam was regarded? But time would fail us to repeat a tithe of what stands charged on the book of human life to the account of this blind passion for the "beaten track." This astonishing dread of innovations and improvements which have been "tabooed by the consecrating hand of time." But, while we wonder and smile at the follies of former generations, may we not, with truth, ask, is there not something of the same spirit in our dispositions and conduct? Are there no persecuted Galileos, no ridiculed Harveys, no caricatured Jenners, no abused Pares, no insane Pestalozzis in our day? Are there no despised benefactors, no ill-requited laborers for the improvement of mankind, no martyrs to science and human kindness? Are there no sticklers for the old paths, who care infinitely less for the interest of science than for the preservation of some favorite antiquated notion? Was it not conclusively demonstrated by scientific men that it would be utterly impossible to cross the Atlantic by steam? Only a few years ago did we not hear serious objections urged to etherization as a relief from pain in cases of parturition—objections founded on mistaken religious scruples? Was there not opposition to the introduction of the magnetic telegraph in Germany, on the ground that the wires would prove injurious to the lives and property, and pernicious to the crops of farmers? Let us, then, learn a lesson from the experience of the past, rather than ridicule the weakness and follies we have glanced at. The world may be growing wiser—we believe it is—but the time has not yet come for us to boast a perfect reformation from all the faults which we are so prompt to condemn in our predecessors.

Creole Women.

A Creole, strictly speaking, is one born of foreign parents (principally French or Spanish), though in its loose sense the word is also sometimes applied to any native-born New Orleans person. A Creole, however, according to the proper acceptance of the word, does not necessarily imply that the individual is born in the Crescent city. There are many of them in the West Indies and Mexico.

The popular impression that Creole women are handsome is certainly correct, however much strangers may err in their other inferences concerning them. As a general thing they are not large—in fact, rather petite—but have very pretty, graceful figures and the tiniest of hands and feet. Their eyes are dark and dreamy. From the serpentine glances I cast at them I imagine it is as hard to keep from loving these Creoles as it is to abstain from investing in the Louisiana lottery. Those among the higher classes are also very cultivated, speaking English, French and Spanish, and being skilful musicians and conversationalists. At least I found those whom I met to be possessed of these accomplishments.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Billy Birch is to have a benefit at the Standard Theatre, New York, on April 15th.

The Prohibitionists can justly claim the honor of inaugurating the crusade against tights.

George Wessells is looking forward to his return to California with a good deal of pleasure.

The Nabobs is said to be one of the brightest and funniest of all the musical farce-comedies.

Al. Hayman has booked Lydia Thompson next summer at the California Theatre, San Francisco.

Carroll Johnson is very enthusiastic about The Gossoon, the new play he is to star in next season. He is an intelligent and popular actor.

Sol Smith Russell once swallowed a bottle of varnish on the stage in a drinking scene, and since then he smells the property wine before he drinks.

When the devil has succeeded in filling a young girl's head with the idea that she is a natural born actress, he just lays off a day or two and laughs.

When for the stage the ballet girls prepare,
It surely seems of language a reversal
To wear such clothes as other mortals wear
And call the function an "undress" rehearsal.

The Japanese very seldom go out between the acts at the theater. The only way to account for this shortcoming is that Japan is as yet one of the few countries where the American bar is not a flourishing institution.

Thomas W. Keene is getting quite strong and hearty again after his late illness, and is anxious to get into harness, but will not take the road till the end of August. It is quite probable that he will put on a new piece for the coming season.

The waltz had its beginning in Germany, and thence was taken to France, shortly after which it was introduced into England. Hungary was the birthplace of the galopade, or galop, and from Poland came the stately polonaise, or polacca and mazourka.

Mark Murphy is working hard on his new comedy, O'Dowd's Neighbors. He has engaged a very strong company. Helen Rainsley, a fine soprano, Hattie Delaro Barnes and Jennie Reynolds are three of the principal members of the O'Dowd organization.

Influence, or True Love Never Runs Smooth, is a new comic opera under the management of Warner and Manning. Beatrice Goldie, Carrie Tutein, Eva Donette, W. J. Henshaw, Harry Wright and Thomas J. Johnston are among those engaged for the cast.

"I see by the paper," says Annie Lewis, Hallen and Hart's soubrette, "that Mrs. Brown Potter is going to play Cleopatra in Rome." "Do you think she will make a success of it?" asked Amy Busby, of Mr. Robson's company. "I don't see how she can," was the reply; "Cleopatra didn't."

People have become so accustomed to the big adjective that go with the circus bill that a moderate statement of all the wonders so be seen within the big tent would not attract attention. They are an important part of the show, but it is very exhausting work this year finding adjectives enough.

The five-dollar bill that Uncle Joshua hands to Happy Jack, the tramp, in the first act of The Old Homestead is the real article, and is the first piece of money handed in at the box-office at the Academy when Denman Thompson and his company took possession of the playhouse nearly four years ago. Mr. Thompson is somewhat superstitious, and regards the bill, which happens to be one of the initial series issued on fibre paper in the early sixties, as a mascot.

A well-known English actor, traveling to Birmingham by the Great Western Railway the other day, on approaching Banbury began to feel hungry, says the Jester, and determined to indulge in one of the buns for which the town is famous. The train having pulled up, he hailed a boy, handed him sixpence, and commissioned him to get "two Banburys"—one of the two being promised him for his trouble. Just as the train was about to start that boy came rushing up to the carriage in which the now impatient actor was seated, and holding out threepence change exclaimed, with mouth half full: "Here's your change, sir." "Bother the change; where's the cake?" roared the hungry Thespian. "They had only one left," replied the boy, "and I'm eating that." And then the train moved off.

Book Chat.

Better be cowardly in the face of knowledge than brave through ignorance.

"That man has wonderful intellectual strength," said Bimble. "He is a literary Sampson." "Which," rejoined Bumble, "is probably why he doesn't get his hair cut."

An English publisher announces a new work entitled "He Always Pleased his Wife." It is fiction.

"How may a poet gain the affections of the reading public?" asks a correspondent. By tearing up his MSS. unpublished.

Zole is suffering a great deal from rheumatism, but keeps busy on his book, "La Guerre," which will contain an extended account of the battle of Sedan.

Mr. Thomas Hardy, the novelist, is soon to bring out a collection of short stories contributed by him to English periodicals, the title of which is to be "A Group of Noble Ladies."

"Gid Granger" is the story of an energetic country boy, who develops from a shiftless lad to a plucky, practical business man. Mr. William O. Stoddard tells it with humor and considerable interest.

M. Renan says that the dead Prince Jerome could have written a better history of the Second Empire than any one else, and that if he had eschewed politics, he would have made a great place for himself in France.

Emperor William is "writing" a history of William I, in two volumes, assisted by his former tutor, Professor Hinzpeter. Two hundred copies only will be printed, to be given to the sovereigns of Europe, the Hohenzollern family, and the most important national libraries.

The Marquis of Lorne has written a novel which is soon to be published. It is to be entitled "From Shadow to Sunlight," and peculiar interest attaches to it for the reason that the heroine thereof is a lifelike sketch of an American girl whom the Marquis once met and vastly admired.

It is now claimed that Andre Theuriet and not Marie Bashkirtseff is the author of the celebrated diary. If that is the case the imposture is the cleverest thing ever done by Theuriet. The probabilities are, however, that this is an attempt upon the part of Marie's friends to shoulder the responsibility upon somebody else.

Gertie Holtzmeier, the novelist and writer of short stories, is the wife of Sydney Rosenfeld, the dramatist. She is an English woman by birth, but an enthusiastic Yankee by adoption. Mrs. Rosenfeld is a noble-looking woman with soft, merry blue eyes, a mischievous smile and an exceedingly sweet voice. The Rosenfelds, surrounded by flowers and dogs, live in a charming old-fashioned house at Yonkers. The visitor is greeted by a chorus of delightful yelps, for these eight or nine dogs are the most hospitable creatures in the world. Hither of a Sunday afternoon flock many members of "the profession," and here usually are also seen languid-aired, blaise Clay Greene and priestly shaven, animated Gus Thomas, the collaborateurs of Mr. Rosenfeld.

That there is no end of the curiosities of literature in England is more and more evident to those who keep the run of the auction sales of this kind of curio, a late disposal of which contained a number of the proof-sheets of Lord Tennyson's poems, with autograph corrections; a series of eighty-three drawings by Thackeray, including seven in water colors, which never left the possession of their first owner, and which, therefore, are probably authentic; a copy of the first edition of Walton and Cotton's "Compleate Angler," and a set of Byron-ana, amounting to 263 volumes. Most of these "lots" have found, or will probably find, their way to America, no doubt to the western portion of it, where bacon and money are equally abundant.

The family lawyer will take care of his faithful clients when he gets to Congress.

There is a Justice in Islip, Long Island, of the name of Clock. His principal business is to give time to the prisoners.

The sweetest things that have been said about Chauncey M. Depew have all been wasted. He says he never reads editorials.

Senator Palmer once worked for 25 cents a day on an Illinois farm, and afterward learned the trade of cooper. He paid his own way through college.

A preacher who was rejected by one of his fair parishioners, preached on this subject the following Sunday: "You ask and receive not, because you ask a-miss."

An eminent surgeon says that with four cuts and a few stitches he can alter a man's face so his own mother would not know him. Any newspaper can do that with only one cut.

Nearly all of the most famous of the Senators from Illinois have been Kentucikans by birth. Among them are Palmer, Browning, Oglesby, Cullom, and Yates. Douglas was born in Vermont and Logan was a native of southern Illinois. Lincoln was a Kentuckian, and Grant an Ohio man.

"I have just heard that my family physician is dead. Just think! he was scarcely 30 years old." "Then I must say that I don't see how you can have any confidence in a physician who dies so early."

A man was recently brought to trial before a Judge in one of the French provinces for murdering his wife, when the following droll dialogue ensued: Judge—What prompted you to commit such a horrible crime? Prisoner—Well, your Honor, we were not compatible. Judge—But why kill her—why didn't you get a divorce? Prisoner—A divorce? Ah! I have religious scruples.

A South Carolina physician, asked why he located at Monelova, said: "It is a first-rate place for a doctor. If a man is sick, all you have to do is to tell his friends (no matter whether the affair is serious or not) to go to a priest and have him confess and prepare for death. If he dies they will say, 'What a good doctor he is. He knew he must die and so he had his spiritual interests attended to.' If he recovers they will say, 'What a capital physician he must be. The man was in the last extremity and prepared for death and he cured him.' So in either event it is a first-rate place in which to achieve a medical reputation."

The "Orphic" Element in Poetry.

Among the happiest tributes ever paid by one son of song to another was that bestowed on Wordsworth by Matthew Arnold, in the memorable lines where he says of him—

He was a priest to us all
Of the wonder and bloom of the world,
Which we saw with his eyes and were glad.

And truly this is not only happy as an ascription of homage to the individual poet, but as a description, it is the most felicitous we know, of what constitutes, in the true sense, the poet by pre-eminence. It is a crystallizing in words of the supreme quality distinguishing the "Dii Majores" of the lyre—that quality, without which other endowments, such as wealth of fresh imagery, music of expression, and power to seize and portray characters and feelings, although most precious as auxiliaries, will yet fail, apart from a diviner gift, to reach the true aureole of the Muse. In the case of the great Pan of the Lakes it was this power, frequently yet only fitfully manifested even by him, of what we are inclined to call "Orphic song," that has made the name of Wordsworth the greatest in English literature since Milton, and one of the Three Mighties in the field of English as distinguished from Scotch poetry. In conversation on one occasion with H. Crabb Robinson, Wordsworth came nearest to a revelation of the secret of this mystic power—the occasion, namely, when he let fall the observation as to how common things can be glorified, in the words, "The imagination must irradiate an object with that infinity without which there is no poetry." This, when interpreted, must mean that only when an object is linked on to, and lit up in the light of, the infinite and the eternal, is there any radiance on the horizon, or any vista of hope or joy encircling it beyond this visible diurnal sphere. It is this "Orphic" element, characterizing the great Hierophant of Nature in his higher moods, that has been transfused, as is now well known, from him and his twin-brother Coleridge, though Keats and Shelley and Tennyson, into the main stream of our English verse during the present century; and wherever this element can not be found, there we may feel sure there is no true title to the supreme dignity of poetry, and we look in vain for the inspiration and the poet's dream—

The light that never was on sea or land.

Through the might of this mystic power Wordsworth was enabled to irradiate the common sights and sounds of nature so largely with the light of eternal beauty, and to reveal to us, as none ever did before him with such potency, the glory of the visible world as the symbol of a divine and invisible omnipresence. Hence to him the radiance of mystery surrounding the meanest flower that blows, and the inscrutable depths of feeling in the human heart, which is dowered to be the interpreter of that mystery. All this vision, as Arnold expresses it, of "the wonder and bloom of the world," he taught us to see with his eyes as a fresh revelation, for the world was through this new Orpheus touched with a new emotion, the most fruitful and potential in the domain of poesy known to this latter age and time. Perhaps the most notable trophy of this Orphic spell as exerted by Wordsworth is the titanic muse of Lord Byron. That proud and strong spirit long resisted, but in the end succumbed, while snorting scorn and indignation, to drink deep finally of the love of nature as distilled from Wordsworth, and imbibed through the medium of Shelley, so that in the later cantos of "Childe Harold" he too has learned the mystic mood, and, as he elsewhere expresses it, can find it joy.

To bend upon the mountains high
The quiet of a loving eye.

Thus Byron, the Titanic, has grown Orphic, and become a priest of "the wonder and bloom of the world."—Blackwood's Magazine.

NOTES.

It was a woman, the Princess Rowena, who introduced the kiss into England. Since that time the custom has been steadily growing by what it feeds upon.

"The man who is anxious to do right has friends in Heaven who want to help him." This is probably reliable. They are usually not anywhere within reach.

"Idioms are not universally applicable."

"Which, for instance?"

"Well, a farmer can go to seed and a cow to grass and not be any the worse for it."

A man who wanted some "genuine, home-made and unadulterated Bavarian beer," sent over to Bavaria and got two barrels. He was bragging of its purity, when a chemist analyzed the beer and found the adulteration 7 per cent. greater than in the average American-brewed.

The Socialist colony established by Count Leo Tolstoi on the estate of a wealthy man in the neighborhood of Charkoff, Russia, has been broken up. The owner of the estate gave the colonists every opportunity to fulfill their Utopian dreams, but the continued quarrels prevented it.

In an old geography printed in 1812, California is described as a wild and almost unknown land. Throughout the year it is covered by dense fogs, damp and unhealthy. In the interior are active volcanos and vast plains of shifting snow, which sometimes shoots up columns to a great height. It is wonderful how such a description of this country could have been credited.

A little girl, struggling with her arithmetic the other day, put down her book and looking out of the window said, with a deep sigh: "Oh, dear, mamma, I wish I were an Australian rabbit!" "What on earth do you say such an absurd thing for, Ethel! Why would you like to be an Australian rabbit?" "Because, mamma, I read in the newspapers that they multiplied with wonderful rapidity."

The man who does not laugh—laugh heartily and enjoy it—lacks something in nature. The cold, matter of fact man, who is made up of facts, and void of the sunny imaginations and humors of life, must have been created by contract, and nature made a bungling job of it. We know a few such men in this community, whom it seems to hurt to laugh, or even be amused. Such creatures can only find pleasure in misery.

Queer appetites some creatures have. A butcher, of Seymour, Ind., is said to have found in the stomach of a slaughtered cow a silver half dollar, several small bones, a lot of needles and pins and a quarter of a pound of iron nails. But a more remarkable discovery was that made by a servant in a St. Louis restaurant. While he was opening clams the other day there dropped from one of the bivalves a gold ring inscribed, "S. S. to R. S." The clams had been purchased from a New York house, and were gathered from the ocean bed near Fire Island.

Suppose some one who is familiar with the social as well as the general history of the people of this city, should lift with the magic wand of memory the curtain of the past, and throw the light of day upon some of those people who are now posing as leaders of fashion, and the creme de la creme of society. It is positively painful to witness the efforts of those who a few years ago were ignorant kitchen servants, or the wives of poor shop keepers, trying now to look and act supernaturally grand. We do not envy the ambitious and deserving, but we pity the poor creatures who are trying to act a part which nature in all her liberality has unfitted them. There are a few in this city whom by some inscrutable act of Providence have become well-to-do in this world's goods, who now strive to ape the culture and social standing of those to the manner born. As we have said, such antics are painful in the extreme to those who know the history of the past.

When an alien becomes a citizen of the United States he is required to subscribe to a solemn oath, that he will entirely and forever renounce and abjure all allegiance to every foreign prince, potentate and sovereignty. It seems, however, that this oath is taken with much mental reservation by our Italian fellow citizens, judging from the manner in which they address their native country. There is no good faith to American institutions by people who hold so lightly their oaths of allegiance. No dependence could be placed in them in the hour of trial. We have often said that our loose manner of admitting citizens is dangerous to the country. Few of this class of foreigners have the slightest conception of the obligation taken, or are in accord with our free and liberal institutions. These people are granted the rights of citizenship simply for political party purposes, and not for the welfare of the country.

The United States has 139 war vessels. Among these are some of the finest war ships on the globe—such as the Charleston, Baltimore, San Francisco, Newark, Maine, Vesuvius, Chicago, Boston, Atlanta, and many others. Italy has three of the finest war ships on the sea, Lepanto, Duilio and Dandolo. Italy's entire armament is 67 vessels.

The memoirs of Talleyrand do not disclose the slightest reference to his private life. Not even his marriage is mentioned, and no allusion to that beautiful, yet stupid blonde woman who occupied such a conspicuous place in the halls of the State Department. His memoirs are entirely political in character, with the absolute omission of private affairs. He has dealt with great events, and establishes the fact that under all the trials, he never betrayed France. It is certain from a review of his diplomatic relations France never suffered at his hands. The people of France can forgive much in Talleyrand when his wonderful services are considered.

Would it not show like a little more equality in justice to seize some of the more prominent offenders against lottery laws. We notice that the only prosecutions for an infraction of these laws is directed against some poor unfortunate Mongolian, who perchance is caught selling a ten cent lottery ticket. The large wholesale dealers in the Louisiana, Juarez and Mexican lotteries are not disturbed. Within the past two months a number of Chinamen have been arrested and prosecuted to conviction for their small schemes, while all others are undisturbed. This is not justice. All should be on a line before the laws.

Secretary Blaine is decidedly cool and deliberate amid the flurry and bluster of our Italian cousins. "Just hold your temper, Mr. Italy," says Mr. Blaine. "Uncle Sam will not make any undue haste in the New Orleans matter. You must wait until we can look into the case. Your bluster counts for nothing." The proposition to force Uncle Sam to hang all the parties connected with the affair, without giving the question deliberate investigation, is not at all in tone with our notions of justice, or compliance with treaty obligations. Some of our English newspapers suggest that Italy will send over the Lepanto or Duilio to annihilate our navy; but there might be such a thing as some damned Yankee going out and sinking both those great war ships before they got within a hundred miles of the mouth of the Mississippi. In sober reason, Italy and her cabinet officers are making asses of themselves.

The action of the Italian government in recalling its minister from Washington strikes us as being supremely ridiculous. It hardly seems a government of the dignity of Italy, would take cognizance of the killing of persons belonging to so despicable a society as the Mafia association—a banditti that has been a menace in their native country—and from the action of the populace of New Orleans, it should be understood that the American people are not disposed to mince matters when it comes to dealing with that class. If Italy expects there will be tolerated here, an element which it is disposed to rid itself of; that the American people will not resort to primary and severe punishment, the expectation will not be realized. We only hope that the recall of the Italian minister will result in a reformation of the treaty with Italy, and that hereafter the immigration from that country will be of a desirable element, and of those who, when naturalized, will respect our laws and the rules of action that govern civilized men. The majority of the Italian people among us are good citizens. They are thrifty, and are respected. Among all nationalities, however, there are black sheep; and when they receive punishment for their misdeeds, it seems hardly the part of dignity the matter should be made one provocative of disturbance between nations. It seems to us, the least Italy should have done would have been to remain quiet, and to have silently congratulated itself that a people more determined had stricken a blow at as base an institution as the Mafia. Particularly what comfort will be drawn by the Italian government from the letter of Mr. Secretary Blaine we cannot see, and the government of Italy should have the sense to know that in the attitude it has taken it is but one of disadvantage. We have regarded with but indifference the opinions that have been published of the consequences of a war with Italy. In the first place, foolish as the governmental heads of that nation seem to be, it is not at all likely they will be disposed to precipitate a contest that will inevitably result in injury to themselves only. It has been said that the naval power of Italy is superior to that of the American government, but within the history of this nation, while not having maintained a standing army, or a naval fleet of consequence, we have been abundantly able to take care of ourselves. Particularly is that the case now, in that the administration is especially strong. We take little stock in the inflammatory articles published in the American press, and realize that they in no degree are a reflex of the sentiment of the people. So far as the people are concerned we believe they endorse the action of the citizens of New Orleans. We are of opinion the affair will be a benefit to us in that measures will be enacted that will prevent the immigration of bandits and paupers. This country would not pretend to abolish diplomatic intercourse should the people of another nation visit the death penalty upon the lawless, and the plea they were American citizens would not avail. William Walker, in 1853, organized an expedition for the conquest of Sonora, a Mexican State. Afterward he took possession of Lower California and the United States government forced his capitulation. In 1855 and 1856 he and his followers took possession of Nicaragua, and our government sent a sloop of war to quiet him. Later on he projected another filibustering expedition into the same country, and with his party was captured and shot. The United States government sensibly recognized the fact that Walker deserved the fate he received; that he had gone into a foreign country to create trouble, and that he was in no sense entitled to commiseration from those who had remained at home and attended to their legitimate concerns. It was not then thought that indemnity should be asked on our part, nor was it demanded in the matter of the Crabbe massacre in Mexico. It seems to us that the less said about this affair by the Italian nation the better. It illy comports with the dignity of a power to waste its energies to avenge the killing of men whom it was, perhaps, more willing should leave its shores than we were to receive them.

Sicilian Cruelty and Secrecy.

The last British Consular report from Sicily remarks that there are dark shades in the Sicilian character which contrast with the simplicity by which one might imagine the people to be wholly possessed. They can be deceitful, reticent, malicious and vindictive; petty thefts and robberies are not uncommon; it is said also in gratitude they are wholly deficient. It is significant that to be "scalatro" (cunningly clever) is with them a meritorious quality, and that advantageous lying is regarded with favor even in children.

Owing to the spirit of "mafia" and "omerta," which pervades all Sicily, they combine to hide each other's misdeeds, and in the case of robbery, and even assassination, it is generally impossible to get evidence against the wrong-doers, even from the victims themselves. There is a secret understanding among all that no one shall assist the legal authorities in their efforts to bring criminals to justice, and the Sicilian as a rule relies on himself and all his friends for obtaining retribution for private wrongs, and every one who transgresses this unwritten law has to fear the vendetta of his neighbors.

One of the most disagreeable traits in their character is excessive cruelty to animals, of which travelers in Sicily frequently have seen revolting instances. When remonstrated with on account of this they simply shrug their shoulders and say: "What matters? They are not baptized." They cannot comprehend that any creature has any claim to consideration outside pale of the church. Frightful raws in horses and donkeys go unnoticed, and are fed on by flies; deep holes are plugged with tow, and lame animals are made to work with heavy loads as though nothing was the matter with them.

As for relieving a horse or donkey of a heavy burden going up hill, such a thing never enters their heads. To see a country cart crammed with people behind a horse which can scarcely stagger under the heavy load, and to observe that no one ever endeavors to relieve the poor animal in the most difficult passages, is a common occurrence. Live poultry is carried to the market slung from pack saddles, or by pedestrians from the hand, by the legs. The birds keep their heads up as long as strength endures, till at last they can do so no longer, and die a painful death by a rush of blood to the head. Children are, it is said, taught cruelty to animals from infancy, for one of the commonest sights in town and country is to see children playing with newly caught robin redbreasts and goldfinches, which they hold tied by the leg with a string, and pull back when the poor bird attempts to fly.

Another defect in the character and habits of the Sicilian peasant is lack of cleanliness. But in spite of all these general demeanor and habits of the Sicilian are so pleasing that one feels inclined to regard his deficiencies with much leniency.—London Times.

• A Way out of the Difficulty.

A little child was leaning against its step-mother's knee.

"Mamma," said she, "who was Mary."

"Mary was the wife of Joseph and the mother of Christ," replied the mother.

"But, mamma, I thought that Christ was the son of God."

"So he was, my darling."

"But, mamma, how could Joseph have been Mary's husband?" and then, as light dawned upon the little one, she exclaimed: "Oh, I understand, mamma, dear. Joseph was Mary's second husband—just as papa is yours."

And so it was all explained.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

To night the Ovide Musin Concert Company will give an entertainment at the Congregational church.

"Me an' Jumpsey went to see one o' dem plays by Shakespeare last night," said Swipesy, the newsboy. "Any good?" asked Petie. "Not much. Pooty good. Shake ain't Harrigan."

Next week, E. A. Kilday has made arrangements for the presentation of those ever popular dramas, My Partner, The Planter's Wife, Hazel Kirke, The Danites, Our Boarding House and Ticket-of-Leave Man, running the entire week. The company is said to be excellent, and under the best management.

Last night Sprague's comedians rendered their famous comedy, A Social Session, at the Metropolitan to a full house. The company is substantially the same who presented the farce comedy here about a year ago. There is some catchy music and mirth in the play. A Social Session to-night.

On Thursday night, as was expected, there was a very large audience to greet Billy Emerson and the strong Cleveland combination consisting, in addition, of Barney Fagan, Hughy Dougherty, Luke Schoolcraft, Benedetto, Fields, Hansen, Griffin, Marks, Shaw, Denton Tilla, Noble, Winans, Van Reville, Whitmore, Ormsby, Taylor and Haines. The performance was everything announced by the management.

McMahon's hippodrome and allied attractions commences a season of three days at Fifteenth and M streets, on April 8th. There will be two exhibitions daily, afternoon and evening. The company includes some excellent equestrians, acrobats and gymnasts. We witnessed a performance recently at San Francisco, and can assure our circus-loving people that there are many novelties in the show. The genuine Jo-Jo is one of the attractions.

General Sherman was a constant theatergoer, an ardent admirer of the play, and a staunch defender and upholder of the theatrical profession. He was always saying good words for it. First night audiences at important productions were accustomed to see the General, as he keenly and critically watched the performance. He never missed a first night at Daly's; and Miss Rehan, of the Daly company, had in him an admirer lavish of sincere praise. The General was an intimate friend of most of the best known players, especially of Booth, Barrett, Jefferson and Florence. He was one of the first members of the Players' Club, and made a memorable speech at the supper given at Delmonico's in honor of Edwin Booth by Augustin Daly and A. M. Palmer. The last theatrical performance that he attended was at the Casino; and it was on that night that he caught the cold which developed the fatal attack of erysipelas.

Before Henry Aveling, an actor of Jim the Penman company, took cyanide of potassium and committed suicide, he wrote two letters. They indicated that there were two women in his tale of woe. One of the letters was dashed off in this easy-going fashion: "To the carcass who shall find my shell, greeting: First, I wish William Sheldon, of Jim the Penman company, to do as he likes with my remains; and I hereby constitute him sole owner of every cent I may die possessed of, no matter in what shape my property may be. And I ask William (aforesaid) to be good enough to prevent Miss Mittens Willett from appearing in any of my obsequies." The other letter, to Miss Clara Thompson, said, addressing her as "Clara Dear": "We could not live as we wish, and now I go into the great futurity. Find me there, my darling, if you can." The "Miss Mittens Willett," to whom the actor referred, was his wife (separated from him for a year), an actress, the daughter of a New York journalist. Among the effects of the deceased was also found an old letter from Marguerite Benison, an actress whom he brought with him as his wife from England several years ago, and who threatened him with prosecution for bigamy unless he should pay toward her support all she required of him. Clara Thompson was an actress of the Paul Kaurzar company.

Ingersoll on Shakespeare.

In his panegyric upon Shakespeare, Col. Ingersoll said many pithy things. Here are some of them:

Most great men have had great mothers. Most great women have had great fathers.

Most of the great are like mountains, with the valley of ancestors on one side and the depression of posterity on the other. Shakespeare knew little of kings. He makes them say great things—talk as they should, not as they do. That is proof sufficient to me that he did not know them.

When men are prosperous they are in love with life. Famine and faith go together. In disaster and want the eye of man is fixed upon another world.

The real sustains to the ideal the same relation that a stone does to a statue.

According to the realist, the wax that takes the impression is an artist.

Is it possible that Bacon left the best children of his brain on Shakespeare's doorstep, and kept the deformed ones at home? The fact that Bacon did not claim to be the author of the plays proves that he was not. Suppose a man had left this epitaph for his tombstone in his will:

"Here lies John Smith, inventor of the dog churn."

It is possible that he could have been the inventor of both the dog churn and the locomotive.

Shakespeare's best rises above Bacon's best as a palace rises above a beggar's hut.

All art is of the same parentage.

It is not enough to say great things; dramatic things must be done.

The greatest compliment man ever paid to woman: "Eyes that do mislead the morn."

There is the same difference between talent and genius as between a stone mason and a sculptor.

There is the difference between types and characters that there is between springs and water works.

Shakespeare has done more for woman than all the other writers in the world.

Evening Dress in London Theatres.

I could not help thinking while looking about the house between the acts at Mr. Irving's performance the other night, how deeply shocked those eminent moralists who have so vigorously denounced the ladies of New York for wearing low-cut dresses to the opera would be if they could glance over that billowy sea of décolleté costumes and realize that every theatre in London presented the same picture at the same moment. We Americans still are Puritans, certainly, and probably this strikes the stranger as the sharpest contrast observable between the people of the two countries. Even when she has removed her hat, as she is compelled to do, an American lady feels conspicuous in a London theatre if she is dressed in the fashion prevailing in New York. She utterly lacks the splendor of the women about her, no matter how elaborate her own attire may be. They, with their ornamental coiffures, and with their handsome cloaks spread on the chairs behind them, are, according to the American notion, dressed for a fashionable and formal fete, not for a casual evening at the play.

There is, however, nothing strange, even to the humblest resident of London, in the sight of women in full evening dress, for the reason that, among the very same class of people seen in New York theatres every night dressed in modest street garments, it is an unbreakable rule that evening dress must be put on for dinner, and a lady is guilty of nothing less than exceedingly bad taste if she appears in a high-necked gown. To the American pride—heard so often in the crusade against the décolleté dress—this must appear like a national failing, indicative of a degradation equal to anything known during the Roman decadence. As a matter of fact, it lends a beauty and brilliancy to a London night that the dark city very much needs.—Letter in Pittsburg Dispatch.

Are Women Good Orators.

Should it be argued that many of the speakers (at the recent Women's Convention) were unprofessional, and therefore not to be criticised, I reply that, by appearing publicly on the platform with experienced women, they have renounced the right to plead for mercy, especially when they stand in their own light. Let them go home and learn not only how to write English in a way to command attention, but how to pronounce it purely, and let them cultivate their poor, neglected voices, too often weak and quite as often horribly nasal. It is a pity that the higher education of women does not include the acquisition of melodious speech. When clever women pronounce system, system, the, ther, Massachusetts, Massachusetts, God, Gawd, institution, institution, and so on ad infinitum, and the excellent President talks about an "arousement," a word not found in the dictionary, the best friends of women regret shortcomings which ought not to exist in a republic boasting of colleges and public schools. I have heard many recitations in these much-vaunted schools, but have yet to hear one where the slightest attention is paid to proper production of the voice or to correct pronunciation. Normal schools are no exception to the rule. The very women who take pains to learn to sing are absolutely unendurable in their speaking voices—too fastidious ears at least. This ought not to be.—Kate Field.

Grant and Washburne.

The one man whom Gen. Grant would not talk about during the later years of his life was Elihu Benjamin Washburne.

The two had been warm friends for many years, and Grant had proved his friendship in one way and another, the crowning act being the nomination of Washburne to the French Mission. Yet, after it all, when in 1880 Gen. Grant returned from his trip around the world, and was a candidate for renomi-nation to the Presidency, the very friend upon whom he most depended for assistance was his most malignant opponent. Washburne's opposition to Grant in 1880 was malignant because it involved treachery. Washburne pretended to favor the Grant movement, and when Grant sent for him and confided to him all the secrets of his campaign, Washburne gave no intimation of disapproval, yet all the time he was secretly conspiring to secure the Presidential nomination for himself—a notable illustration of the turpitude to which political ambition is capable of degrading man.

Gen. Grant was warned against Washburne, but he scouted the suggestion that his old friend could possibly be false to him. Grant loved, believed in and trusted those whom he once took into his friendship. He reposed a blind confidence in all such. He could not understand how Washburne could be a traitor.

But when the convention was held, Washburne's treachery became all too apparent. It was the severest blow Grant had received in all his political career. It struck him straight in the heart, producing a shock and a grief that only those acquainted with the peculiar sincerity of Grant's nature can appreciate.

Yet, after it all, Washburne had the monumental temerity on one occasion—and only once—to approach Grant with a view to effecting a reconciliation. It was in the rotunda of the Palmer house. Grant stood there conversing with several gentlemen, when up came Elihu Benjamin Washburne with outstretched hand, a friendly smile and cheery words.

Grant's rebuff was terrible, but it was fully merited. Calmly putting his hands behind him he looked for several moments at Washburne with a steadfast expression, in which no suspicion of recognition was to be detected. Then he deliberately turned his back upon his old friend. Not a word was spoken. Washburne very probably made no further effort to press his attentions, but with a crestfallen air stole away. When Gen. Grant turned around and faced the little party of visitors once more, it was observed that there were tears in his eyes, but he made no reference nor allusion to the painful scene that had just been enacted.

He Clapped His Man on the Back.

It was not a kind thing to do, but he was a young newspaper reporter and was, whether justly or unjustly, regarded as "fresh." His city editor sent him up to a meeting, and he started out a little too eagerly, for he got the address wrong. He was not so familiar with New York as reporters generally are, and by the time he got the address straightened out and found the correct one, the meeting was over and he looked only upon closed doors.

On the elevated train he met three other reporters going down to their offices, and he told them his dilemma.

"Oh, its lucky you got on this train," said one brother newsgatherer. "The very man you want to see is on this train. There he sits down there on the cross seat—the old man with the umbrella and the gray beard."

"And he's a peculiar old chap," said a second man. "You have to know how to treat him. He's the president of the society, you know."

"You want to be diplomatic," put in the third conspirator. "You've got to let him see that you know him. You want to come up behind him, clap him on the back—a good, rousing whack, you know—and say, 'Hello, Jenkins, old boy, how did the little shindy come off to-night?' Then he'll think he knows you and will tell you the whole story."

"Be sure you crack him on the back," was repeated.

"Oh, trust me," said the young reporter, with a confident smile. Down the aisle he went and reaching the "president" he gave him a terrific thump on the back. For one second there was an awful calm. Then "Jenkins, old boy," raised his umbrella and started for the offender. It was a chase for the door, the young man yelling out his apologies, the old man frantically brandishing his umbrella and making violent whacks at the head of his assailant. The younger man reached the door in advance, however, and darting through it slammed it in the old man's face. As the wrathful old gentleman was returning to his seat, red and panting, three young men without consciences were letting out howls of laughter.

A Lesson in Astronomy.

They were young and romantic, and, although the minute hand was pointing to 12 o'clock, they stood upon the porch gazing at the stars.

"That's Jupiter, dear, isn't it?" she murmured.

"Yes, pet, and that is Sirius," he replied, pointing to another star.

"Are you serious?" she cooed.

He kissed her several times. Then he pointed upwards and said:

"That's Mars, dove."

"And that's Pa's," she whispered, as a footstep sounded inside, and if the young man hadn't scooted he would have seen more stars than he ever dreamed of. Her pa wears a 12½ with a brass toe.

"Lloyd," the Standard of Ships.

In the early years of the reign of Charles II, English colonies were beginning to prosper; her commerce, notwithstanding oppressive fiscal laws, was on the increase, and the business of the underwriter naturally followed. London was then the headquarters of the marine insurance business of England, and the city coffee houses, then but of recent origin, were the common meeting places of all connected with the shipping interest; it is the name of the proprietor of one of these establishments that now lives in that of the great corporation of Lloyd's. Edward Lloyd is one of those men of whose history little is known, but of his personality apart from his work we know practically nothing, even his proper name having been lost until recovered by the researches of a recent writer. Finding his house in Tower street regularly frequented by underwriters, Lloyd, who must have been a man of great ability and foresight, appears to have formed the resolution of making it the headquarters of the business, and to this end gave facilities for meetings, arranged for sales of vessels and cargoes, started a newspaper, and practically identified his interests with those of his patrons. The newspaper was short-lived, being suppressed by the government; but his labors were rewarded by his seeing his establishment—latterly removed to Lombard street—the center of marine insurance business, not only for London, but for the kingdom. Three generations of underwriters met at the Lombard street coffee house, and when, in 1770, having formed an association, they removed to premises of their own, and shortly after to the Royal exchange, they took the name of their old headquarters with them; and thus it has come about that the greatest marine insurance corporation the world has seen owes its name and, to a certain extent, its origin, to a London coffee-house keeper at the time of the restoration, to whose memory the foreign ship owning companies' titles of Austrian Lloyds, North German Lloyds, Argentine Lloyds, etc., are additional tributes. The classified list of shipping already referred to as the oldest extant is dated 1704, but is, unfortunately, somewhat mutilated. The work is arranged in a form very similar to that of the register books of to-day, giving in parallel columns the name of the vessel, tonnage, date of building, owner, etc.; and also what is evidently intended for a character or class, one or other of the vowels A, E, etc., in conjunction with the letters G, M or B.

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court and for said county. The People of the State of California to Helen A. Grant, Allen D. Grant, Edward N. Grant, Catherine Matzen, Mary M. Miller, John Doe, and Richard Roe, greeting.

You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the county of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 20th day of January, 1891, in which action EDWARD DIETERLE is plaintiff and you are defendants.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: The said action is brought for the purpose of quieting the title to that certain piece or parcel of land situated, lying and being in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, and State of California, and described according to the plan of said city, as the south twenty (20) feet of the west sixty-eight (68) feet of lot number one, in the block bounded by J and K, and 5th and 6th streets; for the purpose, also, of determining all adverse claims of the said defendants to said property; and for a decree of said Court, declaring and adjudging that the title of plaintiff to said premises is good and valid, and that neither the said defendants have, nor any of them has, any estate or interest in the same; and forever enjoining and debarring the said defendants, and each of them, from asserting any claim to said land adverse to plaintiff, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made.

And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court this 20th day of February, A. D. 1891.

ABOUT AMBER.

A Valuable Substance which is Growing Scarcer Each Year.

Amber has so long been identified with the luxury of perfect enjoyment behind a pipe or cigar that it is not pleasant to be reminded that the supply is gradually diminishing, and unless new deposits are found it will eventually be exhausted.

Familiar as most people are with the substance, few realize as they touch to their lips the pretty bit of color, that it is a product of nature dating so far back in the ages that no record of its origin is attainable. For all we know to the contrary, it was contemporaneous with Adam and Eve. The prophet Ezekiel speaks of a great cloud, with a fire infolding it and a brightness about it of the color of amber. The classic writers of old compared it with the yellow tresses of the celestial divinities.

Sophocles sang of amber as "the congealed tear drops of the birds that mourned the death of Meleager." As tradition hath it, "the sisters of Meleager wept unceasingly after his death, until Diana changed them into guinea hens, which were transferred to the island of Leros." A still older fable, coeval with Hesiod himself (who lived about 735 B. C.), and wrote an account of the birth of the world and the origin of the gods, relates how Phæthon paid the penalty of his drive across the heavens in the chapter of the sun, Zeus having killed him with a flash of lightning and hurled him down into the river Eridanus. His sisters, the Heliades, daughters of Helios (the sun), who had yoked the horses to the chariot, bewailed the death of their brother so bitterly that the gods, in compassion, changed them into poplar trees that "shed tears of amber." In later times the Eridanus was supposed to be the same as the river Po, because amber was found on its banks; hence, the Electrides insule, or "amber islands," are placed at its mouth.

The philosophers showed themselves scarcely less imaginative than the poets. With them amber was a liquid produced by the rays of the setting sun, or an excretion of the ocean thrown up by its waves in the spring, or the gum of certain trees growing on some of the inaccessible islands in the Adriatic, which exuded from their branches on the rising of the dog star. Thales, the first to observe its electrical properties, was so struck with its power of attracting other substances that he did not hesitate to endow the amber with the possession of a soul. Absurd as were the deductions, they constitute the germ of the modern science of electricity, which takes its name from elektron, the Greek word for amber.

Pliny arrived much nearer the truth than any of his predecessors, when he alleged it to be a resinous juice oozing from old pines and firs and discharged into the sea, where taking lodgment, it was gradually hardened by the influence of heat or cold, or the action of the sun. The origin of amber has also been a matter of dispute among naturalists, some describing it as an animal substance resembling beeswax, secreted by an ant inhabiting pine forests; others maintaining it to be a fossil mineral of antediluvian origin. But according to the recent researches of Goppert, amber is nothing more than an indurated resin derived from various trees of the gum family, which resin is found in a similar condition in all zones, because its usual original depositories, namely, beds of brown coal, have been formed almost everywhere under similar circumstances.

A convincing proof that amber was once fluid is afforded by the fact that insects, leaves, drops of clear water, or portions of metal, sand and other articles are sometimes found enclosed in it. Occasionally the insects are entire, and in a fine state of preservation, but frequently their detached legs and wings indicate a hard struggle to escape from the viscid mass. Bees, wasps, gnats, spiders and beetles have been observed in specimens, and because they were imbedded ages ago in the soft tree gum they are in demand by collectors and by college museums; there the enclosures are subjects of careful study by naturalists. The discovery of such a bit of amber is a bit of good fortune, for unusual value is attached to the unlucky prisoner.

Very beautiful specimens containing insects ages old may be seen in the establishment of an amber expert and merchant in New York City. If he takes the fancy he will lead you into a queer looking little workshop. The walls look as if they were afflicted with an eruption of carving tools. Odd looking lathes and polishing machines, racks and cabinets full of the raw and half completed material, are all around you. Pulling out a nest of drawers he will show you a great quantity of dull looking, irregularly shaped lumps, and explains that no product is more variable in price. One lot may be purchased for $1 a pound, while another, that appears to the unpracticed eye not a whit more valuable, may be worth $50.

The amber is found in different sizes, varying from that of a nut to a man's hand. A piece weighing one pound might be worth $50, but a piece weighing twelve or thirteen pounds would be thought cheap at $5,000. In the time of the Romans, Nero used an amber drinking cup, and an amber dish represented the countenance and history of Alexander. The historian Gibbon tells us that among the Greeks the material was so greatly appreciated that the amphitheatres were adorned with either silver, gold or amber.

In modern times amber is chiefly obtained on sea coasts after storms, when it is either picked up on the beach or sought after by men who walk up to their necks in the waves, with long poles to which nets are attached; or it is gathered from precipitous cliffs by men in boats, who go armed with poles and iron hooks, and loosen fragments of rocks in exploring them. The latter methods are not without danger to the amber seekers. Amber occurs in beds in Greenland, Prussia, France and Switzerland, but the greater portion of it comes from the southern coasts of the Baltic Sea, where it is thrown up between Koenigsberg and Memel. It is also obtained by mining at a distance of 200 feet or more from the sea, and has been met with in gravel beds near London. Not many years ago specimens were found on Cape Sable, in Maryland.

In 1884 the amber gathering on the shores of the Baltic was more abundant than ever before known at the same spot. In the village of Kahlberg alone, where the product was "farmed," it is estimated that twenty thousand thalers worth of amber was picked up in the course of a few weeks. It is supposed that this increased quantity resulted from the violent storms that prevailed on the coasts of the Baltic during the preceding winter, by which the treasure was thrown up from the bottom of the sea. One of the largest pieces of amber at present known is in the royal cabinet at Berlin, its weight being about eighteen pounds.

It is a mistake to suppose that amber is only used to tip pipes, or give additional glory to a choice cigar; for, being full of electricity, the smaller fragments are made into beads, and worn by many people as a preventive of sore throat and croup. Children find relief in chewing upon the polished surface while cutting teeth. The Chinese wear bracelets made of amber, and use large quantities of it in the construction of idols.

Amber is designated as clear, cloudy or milky. The eastern nations prefer the milky variety, but Americans as a rule choose the cloudy variety because it is less easily imitated by gum copal. The material is worked with a chisel and turning wheel, the former having a razor-like edge, and the most beautiful objects are produced. Among the collections of an artist, which he preserves as evidence of the kind of apprenticeship he passed through, is an amber skull. It is less than three-quarters of an inch high, but the bones and articulations are distinctly marked. A magnifying glass is necessary to enjoy the marvelous detail of the carving.

Another specimen is a holder, with a hollow head of a monk for the cigar, the old recluse laughing; but you can only see the wrinkles in his face through a glass. There are still other representations in art that will vie in perfection with the most famous statues, and yet there may not be half an inch of substance on which to carve the lines.

Take it all in all, amber in its history and results constitutes one of the most interesting studies in natural history, and to see the deft workman evolve from the crude mass forms of beauty on which the eye loves to linger is a luxury that is enjoyable by every devotee of high art.

HOW HE WON HER.

"Ivy!"

The girl's slender fingers toyed nervously with the sweet clover blossoms that she held, and she looked away over the fields and hills and wished with all her heart that those same grand hills and broad meadows were between herself and the handsome man standing so near her and looking down upon her with a light in his dark eyes that she could not mistake.

Graham Jerome was not a rich man, and, although Ivy loved him as she could never love anyone else, she was not quite sure that she was ready to give up everything for love; and, besides, she was only 19, and he had seen nearly 40 years.

"Ivy!" he said again, and she raised her flushed face, saying respectfully:

"Sir?"

He smiled just a little at her tone, and then abruptly asked:

"How old are you, Ivy?"

"Young enough to be your daughter, Mr. Jerome."

The man's face flushed hotly, for he was very sensitive about the years between them, and after a few moments of silence he put out his hand and taking hers for scarcely a moment in his own hand, he said coldly:

"I beg your pardon, Miss Baker; I forgot you were a child, with a child's feeling. It is not necessary that I should explain why I asked you here for a last walk to-day, for you are too young, I presume, to understand me."

He raised his hat in adieu; but Ivy, hurt and angry at his tone, called after him, saying scornfully:

"If you see any pretty dolls in the city, you will send me one, won't you, Mr. Jerome?"

He did not answer, for he was more hurt at the allusion to the differences in their ages than she knew; but his silence was so provoking that she called again.

"Mr. Jerome!"

He turned with a new hope in his heart; but without looking at him she said, sweetly: "If it is not asking too much, I would like some bonbons with the doll; all children like them."

He was hurt before, but he was angry now, and his eyes flashed ominously as he answered her insolence:

"You will beg my pardon for this before we are friends again, Miss Baker."

"I never will," said Ivy, most decidedly, "unless—"

"Well?" he said, still hoping for some word of encouragement.

"Unless you give me the doll and bonbons."

He turned and strode away without a word. Ivy watched him out of sight, and then listened until she heard the whistle of the train that bore him away to the city to practice as a physician; and she knew that it would be long, weary days before he would come back. She tried to make herself believe that she did not care; but the tears came in the soft, blue eyes, and she gathered up the clover blossoms he had arranged for her and kissed them softly, for she did love the handsome doctor, and would very likely have told him so if he had returned; but Graham Jerome, sitting in the crowded cars was thinking bitterly that he had made a fool of himself, and he bit his lip with vexation as he thought of the doll and bonbons.

Then he thought sadly of his 40 years, and wondered how he could have been so foolish as to imagine that one so young and lovely as Ivy Baker could link her fresh young life with his. And he felt even older than he was, for all his life had been a continued struggle with poverty, and each year had been full of care. He had his young sister and mother to support, and had never thought of a wife until he met Ivy Baker.

But now a physician, an old and valued friend, had died, and in taking this position, with a good practice, the way seemed clearer and brighter, and he had dared to think of Ivy.

The months went slowly by, and when nearly a year had passed Mr. Jerome returned.

One of his sisters was about to be married and insisted upon his being groomsman and Ivy bridesmaid.

He came on the evening train, scarcely an hour before time, and Ivy fastened the bows in her hair with trembling hands, and went down to meet him with a beating heart, wondering what he would say and do.

He was standing in the hall when she came slowly down the stairs, looking more handsome than ever, and Ivy wondered how she had ever dared to tell that dignified, haughty-looking man that he was old enough to be her father.

She need not have feared reproach from him, for he came forward saying with perfect ease, as he quietly took her hand: "How do you do, my daughter?"

She did not answer, and he looked smilingly on the flushed face and downcast eyes. There was no time to say more until after the ceremony had been performed; then he drew her out to the moonlit porch, and turning, said gravely:

"Have you not a kiss for your father, Ivy?"

An angry light gleamed in her eyes; she drew back laughingly, saying:

"You forget yourself, Dr. Jerome; I am not a child!"

He laughed; and said carelessly:

"I am sorry to hear that, Miss Baker, for you will hardly appreciate the lovely doll and bonbons that I have brought for you."

She turned away her face, saying, softly: "I did not know that you were so unforgetting, Mr. Jerome."

"You have not asked my forgiveness," he said, eagerly.

"And I never will," she answered, with her old spirit.

"But you said you would if I brought the doll and bonbons, Ivy. Isn't your word good?"

He held up before her a tiny doll and a beautiful box filled with confectionery, and she laughed in spite of herself.

Dropping on her knees, still laughing, and clasping her hands in mock supplication, she said:

"I beg your pardon, father."

He took the bright face between his hands, detaining her.

"That is not enough, Ivy; you must confess, too."

"I have nothing to confess."

"You must confess that you love me."

"But I don't," she answered, her face crimson with blushes.

But he read a different light in her blue eyes; and, although she is his wife now, he cannot teach her to call him anything but father.

JENKS' DREAM.

Jenks had a queer dream the other night. He thought he saw a prize-fighters' ring, and in the middle of it stood a doughty little champion who met and deliberately knocked over, one by one, a score or more of big, burly-looking fellows, as they advanced to the attack. Giants as they were in size, the valiant pigmy proved more than a match for them. It was all so funny that Jenks woke up laughing. He accounts for the dream by the fact that he had just come to the conclusion, after trying nearly every big, drastic pill on the market, that Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets, or tiny Sugar-coated Granules, easily "knock out" and beat all the big pills hollow! They are the original and only genuine Little Liver Pills.

Beware of Imitations, which contain Poisonous Minerals. Always ask for Dr. Pierce's Pellets, which are Little Sugar-coated Pills, or Anti-bilious Granules. One a Dose.

SICK HEADACHE.

Bilious Headache, Dizziness, Constipation, Indigestion, Bilious Attacks, and all derangements of the stomach and bowels, are promptly relieved and permanently cured by the use of Dr.

Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets. They are gently laxative, or strongly cathartic, according to size of dose. Smallest, Cheapest, Easiest to take. 25 cents a vial, by druggists.

Greenland Ice as a Highway.

For more than 150 years the inland ice of Greenland has been a source of increasing interest and speculation to travelers and scientists, and especially to students of the physical history of the earth. For how much longer it has been an object of superstitious horror to the scattered Eskimos who inhabit the narrow strip of barren mountains intervening between it and the Arctic seas, there is not even a legend to say. The results of the various attempts to explore it leave little or no room to doubt that the interior of Greenland is entirely submerged beneath the accumulated frozen precipitation of ages. This great congealed reservoir has an area of some 600,000 square miles, equal to about three times the area of France or the German Empire, and twelve times the area of New York State. Its frozen surface in the center is 9,000 to 10,000 feet above sea level. Mount Blanc buried in it would lose two-thirds its height, and two Mount Marcy's piled one upon the other, would scarcely break its surface. From every point along its circumference, where gaps in the Titan dam of mountains that holds it in check permit, issue resistless glacier streams, some of which are larger than the entire glacier system of the Alps. This unique phenomenon is extremely interesting both per se and in its relations to the glacial epoch in this country and in Europe; and further efforts for its exploration and study will continue to be made, and will yield valuable results; but to me its great charm is that to the proper party, properly equipped, it is an imperial highway, the like of which exists nowhere else under the sun.

The Charm of the Cuckoo.

The habits and mannerisms of the cuckoo have been more accurately observed than perhaps those of any other bird. For thousands of years naturalists have been trying to understand and explain its mysterious ways, but have not fully succeeded.

There yet remain many impenetrable and seemingly never to be understood mysteries connected with it. Enough about it has, however, been found out to prove that it is the bird of the strangest habits known.

A native of this continent can hardly realize the charm of the notes of the cuckoo. From a musical point of view there is not much in them, but the name of the bird is evidently onomatopoeic; that is, formed from the sounds emitted by it, and this name is the same, or nearly the same, in the languages of all the countries it frequents.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

Several months ago we wrote on unrequited genius. Some of the brightest lights the world ever knew were poor, poverty-stricken beings, who actually starved amid their flights of genius. In many instances poverty and genius are kindred spirits. A recent writer has advanced the idea of the heredity of genius; or, rather, the actual fact that there is no such thing as heredity of genius. The broadest minds and brightest geniuses often spring from the most obscure sources. The great artist, Giotto, was the son of a narrow-lived, simple herdsman, without culture. Da Vinci, the great historian, inventor, logician, artist, musician and poet, sprang from an obscure origin. The prince of Scotland poets, Robert Burns, was the son of a gardener. Ruben's father was a silversmith. The father of the great sculptor, Canova, who could almost put life and blood into marble, was an ignorant quarry-man. Rollin, the famous historian, was the son of a Parisian cutler. Boccaccio, so distinguished in the literary world, was the son of a Florentine tradesman, and was in his early youth a clerk in a store. Pope's father, like Southey's, was a linen draper. Oliver Cromwell's father was a brewer. The noted Englishman, who has cut such a figure in tariff discussions, Richard Cobden, is a farmer's son, and who spent his younger life herding sheep. Benjamin Franklin's father was a tallow chandler. Hiram Powers was the son of a Vermont farmer. The father of the great Cardinal Wolsey was a butcher. Horne Tooke, the wit and priest, was the son of a poultry dealer, and as his witty son spoke of his father to his aristocratic Eton associates, "He was a turkey merchant." The great German astronomer, Kepler, was the son of a poor inn-keeper. Richard Wagner's father was the son of a Police Court Dogberry. The above are some of the instances where great minds received nothing from ancestry. The "Study of Genius," however, discloses the fact that in some cases there has been, and is, an identity of mental similarity transmitted from parent to child. We give some taken from the "Study of Genius:"

James Watt's early love of tools and his mechanical dexterity may very readily be traced to his father, who was a carpenter and a builder. The father of Pallissy, the noted Huguenot potter and naturalist, was a tilemaker and worker in clay. Edmund Burke's father was an attorney of some prominence in Dublin. Alexander's father was Philip, king of Macedonia, a successful general and ruler, and the originator of the famous Macedonian phalanx. Both the father and brother of Hannibal were noted generals. Solon was descended from Codrus. The father of Pericles, Xanthippus, was a successful Greek general, and his mother was a niece of Clisthenes, an Athenian statesman. Charlemagne was grandson of the illustrious Charles Martel. Not only were Bach's father and brothers musicians, but his ancestor's for generations back were of the same turn of mind. Mozart's father was a professor of music. Weber's father was a man of musical taste and of some skill in the same direction. No little part of Mendelssohn's peculiar bent, and all the merit of his earlier musical training, must be accredited to his highly cultivated mother. Raphael's father was a painter of considerable reputation in his day. John Wesley's ancestors for four generations back had been scholarly churchmen. Van Dyck, the master of portrait painters, was particularly fortunate in his parents, his father having been a painter on glass and his mother a painter of landscapes, from whom, also, he received his earliest art instructions. The father of Bichat, the skilled anatomist and physician, was himself a physician of no mean repute. Alfred, the Great, was a grandson of the great Egbert. Plato declared himself to be descended in direct line from the gods.

Scientific men are the most credulous creatures in the world. For a rich and rare exhibition of this credulity, a writer in April Atlantic Monthly discusses "prehistoric man," and seeks to substantiate the genuineness of the Calaveras skull, made celebrated by Bret Harte, and alleged to have been found in a gravel pit, near Angels Camp. After reciting the find of stone implements, as an evidence of man's antiquity, the learned scientist gravely says: "From the remains of animals found associated with man in deposits beneath Table Mountain, we find that he was then familiar with the unwieldy form and long-curved tusk of the mammoth and mastadon, cart-loads of their fossil bones having been collected from the gold-bearing gravels, as may be inferred from Truthful James' account of the 'Row upon the Stanislaw.'"

Here is, indeed, a rich scientific discovery—Truthful James quoted as authority on prehistoric man. This is science run mad. The poetic fancy of the pliocene skull gravely given as authority. This is enough to make us laugh out in meetin'. Next we will have Mark Twain's "Jumping Frog" quoted in scientific works. Sam Davis' famous Carson "Foot-prints" have already done service for the credulous scientist.

The prominent actors in the Civil War have mostly passed away. Within the last few months death has claimed Generals Sherman and Johnston and Admiral Porter. The names and memories of the military leaders on both sides in the great contest yet remain fresh in the public mind; yet, in the cases of many of them, but a few years will elapse when they will become almost unknown to fame and history. The death roll is of men who deserve to be longer remembered than they will be, save with few exceptions. It embraces, with others, Generals Geo. B. McClellan, George H. Thomas, George G. Meade, Albert Sydney Johnston, P. H. Sheridan, U. S. Grant, Robert E. Lee, Francis P. Blair, Braxton Bragg, John C. Breckenridge, E. R. S. Canby, John B. Floyd, John C. Fremont, James A. Garfield, Thomas J. Jackson, Philip Kearney, F. W. Lander, John A. Logan, Nathaniel Lyon, George A. McCall, Benj. McCulloch, Irvin McDowell, J. B. McPherson, J. K. F. Mansfield, T. F. Meagher, O. M. Mitchell, Leonidas Polk, Stirling Price, John A. Quitman, John A. Rawlins, John F. Reynolds, I. B. Richardson, L. H. Rosseau, D. A. Russell, Winfield Scott, John Sedgwick, J. E. B. Stuart, E. V. Sumner, David E. Twiggs, Henry A. Wise, John E. Wood, George Crook, Henry W. Halleck, Isaac I. Stevens, J. B. Magruder, Robert Anderson, Richard S. Ewell, John A. Dix, James Shields, John B. Hood, Joseph Hooker, A. E. Burnside, W. S. Hancock, and Robert Toombs. The list is, of course, but partial. Among the dead naval commanders are, David G. Farragut, John A. Dahlgren, John A. Winslow, J. L. Worden, J. R. Sands, Chas. B. Preble, A. H. Foote, Charles Wilkes, Charles A. Davis, and C. S. Boggs. The short life of military fame is strikingly illustrated by the history of the Mexican War. Subtracting Generals Scott and Taylor, few of the names of the prominent participants are now remembered; yet there were many who deserved more lasting recognition. One very distinguished was Gen. William J. Worth, who had served with credit in the War of 1812, and remained in the army until his death, in 1849. In the war with Mexico he rose to the rank of Major General, and his distinguished services won for him the approval of Congress and of State Legislatures. John E. Wool also served in the War of 1812, and in 1841 was promoted to be Brigadier General, maintained that rank during the Mexican War, and in the Civil War became a Major General. William O. Butler was a Major in the War of 1812, served in Congress, became a Major General in the Mexican War, and succeeded to the command of General Scott. Afterward he ran for Vice-President, unsuccessfully, but filled distinguished civil offices. Major General Edmund P. Gaines entered the army in 1799, and received his high commission in 1813. In reward for his services, Congress voted him a gold medal. He died in New Orleans in June, 1849. Of those who subsequently figured in the Civil War, their rank in the Mexican War was as follows: Gideon J. Pillow was a Major General, U. S. Grant a Lieutenant, Benjamin McCulloch (afterward Sheriff of this county) a Captain, Braxton Bragg a Lieutenant-Colonel, Thos. W. Sherman a Captain, Jefferson Davis a Colonel, John A. Quitman a Major General, David E. Twiggs and James Shields Brigadier Generals, W. S. Harney a Colonel, John C. Fremont a Lieutenant-Colonel, George G. Meade a Lieutenant, George H. Thomas a Major, Joseph Hooker a Lieutenant-Colonel, George B. McClellan and George Stoneman Captains, Robert E. Lee a Colonel, and H. W. Halleck a brevet Captain. Among others who were distinguished in the war of 1846 were Brigadier General Franklin Pierce, who was elected President in 1852; Generals Bennet, Riley, Persifer F. Smith and Stephen W. Kearney, who later on figured prominently in California; Commodore R. F. Stockton, afterward Governor of and Senator from New Jersey; Lieutenant Kit Carson, the noted pathfinder; Brigadier General Joseph Lane, afterward a nominee for Vice President, Governor of and Senator from Oregon; Colonel Jack Hays, of the Texas Rangers, afterward the first Sheriff of San Francisco.

The New York World, in commenting on the American dress coat, is decidedly opposed to abolishing our distinctive article of gentleman's wear. The tailor wants to abolish the dress coat and substitute a yearly changing fashion in its stead, because he wants to make more coats than now. But what are the tailor's profits—even when his bills are paid—in comparison with the freedom of men from the thralldom of capricious fashions, and their exemption from the expense of new clothes? The dude wants the dress coat abolished in order that he may exhibit what he mistakes for his skill and inventiveness in dress; but what is, in fact, his tailor's command. But the less the dude is considered in human affairs, the better for human affairs. And there is the broad consideration of men's incapacity to dress becomingly. Women have that gift, and their exercise of it is a delight. They make pictures of themselves which are so charming that to look at them is the sensible man's chief inducement to go into society at all. No gallery of paintings on earth is one-half so well worth looking at as a drawing-room full of well-dressed dames and damsels. But men could accomplish nothing of this kind. They would make guys instead of pictures of themselves if left free by convention to decorate their persons at will. Granted that a full-dress suit is not beautiful; at least, it is not grotesque or ridiculous, and being a uniform it never attracts attention. It is an observed fact, that the less attention most men attract the better for their own and others comfort. The dress coat is an institution conceived in wisdom, brought forth in kindness, and preserved in masculine self defense. Esto perpetuo! which means that it must never "go," or words to that effect."

RELICS OF WASHINGTON.

Lawrence Washington's Collection of Family Heirlooms Described. Some Very Remarkable Manuscripts.

The Philadelphia Times, of a recent date, contains the following, which, be it true or otherwise, furnishes interesting reading:

Washington's account book, kept from March 4, 1793, to March 25, 1797, by his secretary, Mr. Danridge, is interesting, as it is the only account book in existence containing Washington's expenses during the second term of his Presidency, and the only one relating to his official career, not owned by the government. In it we find the various credits for his compensation as President of the United States, together with many items of a private nature, including all the entries of his household and personal expenses, some of which I quote:

March 27—Paid for striking off 30 handbills of Knights of Malta, $1.

April 6—Paid Mr. Winstanley for two paintings of views on the North river, 30 guineas.

April 23—Paid Dr. Collins one-fourth part of the President's subscription towards enabling M. Micheau to explore the Western country to the South sea, $25.

April 24—Paid for eight tickets to the circus, $8.

April 25—Contingent expenses delivered to G. S. Washington to buy tickets in the Home Lottery, $30.

July 17—Paid S. Sayre, Esq., for 485 bottles champagne and Burgundy wine at 8-6 per bottle, $355.67.

November 20—Paid for putting a lock on the President's room at Germantown, 13c.

November 22—Paid William Brinhurst, sent by Mr. Randolph, express to Colonel Franks at Nazareth, with a letter relative to renting his house in Germantown for the President, $15.67.

January 6, 1794—Paid in full for twenty tickets purchased by the President in the Fitchburg Lottery, $188.

July 10—Paid for fleecy shirts and drawers for the President, $39.

November 17—Gave a man who had a very sagacious dog, for the family to see his performances, $3.

August 25—Paid for the President to see the elephant, $1.75.

November 24—Gave by order of the President toward building a Catholic church in Philadelphia, $50.

In my article of last Sunday, I attempted to attract the reader's attention to the character of Washington as a boy. Some interest will, therefore, be manifested in what may be considered one of the leading items of value in this collection—Washington's memorandum cash account, kept from September 10, 1747, to October 14, 1749, and January 1, to March 8, 1760. This is one of the most interesting writings of Washington's extant, on account of its early date and extreme rarity, and as it exhibits the first President's wonderful business tact at the tender age of fifteen. His boyish accounts were kept principally with the members of the Washington family. The items are mostly shillings and pence. It is to be presumed that at that age a pound was seldom in his possession. Another fine specimen of Washington's chirography, at the age of twenty-four, is his account with the estate of Lawrence Washington, his half-brother, recorded July 21, 1756.

Among the relics of Washington stands paramount in this collection, a book of the greatest value, composed of twenty-four small duodecimo pages, all in the handwriting of Washington when about twenty years of age. It is Washington's MSS. prayer book, entitled the "Daily Sacrifice," and intended for use "Sunday morning, Sunday evening, Monday morning, Monday evening, Tuesday morning, Tuesday evening, Wednesday morning, Wednesday evening, Thursday morning." This little book may be considered the most hallowed of all the writings in existence attributed to Washington. It shows the fervent religious nature of the great man, and cannot but be of the greatest interest to all church people. I quote the prayer for Sunday morning:

Almighty God, and most merciful Father, who didst command the children of Israel to offer a daily sacrifice to Thee, that thereby they might glorify and praise Thee for Thy protection both night and day, receive, O Lord, my morning sacrifice which I now offer to Thee, I yield Thee humble and hearty thanks that Thou hast preserved me from the dangers of the night passed, and brought me the light of this day, and the comforts thereof, a day which is consecrated to Thine own service and for Thine honor. Let my heart, therefore, gracious God, be so affected with the glory and majesty of it, that I may not do mine own works, but wait on Thee, and discharge those weighty duties Thou requirest of me; and since Thou art a God of pure eyes, and wilt be sanctified in all who draw near unto Thee, who dost not regard the sacrifice of fools, nor hear sinners who tread in Thy courts, pardon, I beseech Thee, my sins, remove them from Thy presence, as far as the east is from the west, and accept of me for the Merits of Thy Son, Jesus Christ, that when I come into Thy temple and compass Thine altar my prayer may come before Thee as incense, and as I desire Thou wouldst hear me calling upon Thee in my prayers, so give me grace to hear Thee calling on me in Thy word, that it may be wisdom, righteousness, reconciliation and peace for the saving of my soul on the day of the Lord Jesus. Grant that I may hear it with reverence, receive it with meekness, mingle it with faith, and that it may accomplish in me, Gracious Lord, the good work for which Thou hast sent it. Bless my family, kindred, friends and country. Be our Lord and guide this day and forever, for His sake who laid down in the grave and rose again for us, Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The next object of our inspection was Washington's receipt book, interesting as many of the receipts were paid out by Samuel Faunce, who kept the well-known Faunce's tavern, at Broad and Wall streets, New York. He was one of Washington's stewards during the second term of his Presidency, and the receipts are acknowledgments for money he expended to purchase sundries for the President's household.

"I wish to show you now," said Mr. Washington, "a very curious mourning ring that my distinguished relative had made at the time of the death of his half-brother, Lawrence Washington; before his death he gave it to Lawrence Washington's widow, and from her it descended to its present owner, a member of the Fairfax family." He handed to the writer for inspection a small engraved gold band, with a setting in silver of one large diamond, surrounded with six smaller ones. Around the gold band is engraved the name of Lawrence Washington, which, during the course of many years of wearing, has been nearly rubbed off.

No doubt those readers, who have seen this collection at the National Museum at Washington, will remember Washington's mantel mirror which was on exhibition there. This handsome relic hung for many years in the parlor at Mount Vernon. It is encased in a gilt frame, decorated with an American eagle with outspread wings, and a scroll bearing the coat of arms of the Washington family.

Mr. Washington apparently took great pride in displaying a beautiful bust of Necker, Minister of Finance to Louis XVI. It was presented to Washington by Count D'Estaing in 1790. The bust is made of Parian and mounted on a white pedestal with gray marble top. On the pedestal are two brass plates. Upon the upper plate are the words:

Qui Nobis Restitute Rem.

And upon the lower plate:

Presented to

GEORGE WASHINGTON,

President of the United States of America, by his most dutiful, most obedient and most humble servant, ESTAING, a citizen of the State of Georgia, by an Act of the 22d February, 1785, and a citizen of France in 1786.

Count D'Estaing, who presented this bust to Washington, twice commanded the French fleet on our coast in co-operation with the American army on land. He became a member of the Assembly of Notables in the early part of the French Revolution and, being suspected of unfriendly feelings towards the Terrorists, he was destroyed by the guillotine on the 29th of April, 1793.

For some time my curiosity had been considerably excited about the contents of a large wooden case which rested on the table to my right. When this case was opened by Mr. Washington and he drew forth a violin, upon which he proceeded to play a lively air, I was astonished. He assured me that the instrument belonged to Washington and was frequently used by him. It was a remarkably fine-toned instrument, with the name of the maker inside:

Jacobus Stainer, in Absam prope Oenipontum, 1675.

A portrait of Louis XVI, king of France, presented to Washington by Louis, in a magnificent gilt frame, Lawrence Washington considers to be one of the most valuable items in this remarkable collection; and it is certainly a most interesting relic of Washington and America's best friend, Louis XVI. It is a copy of the celebrated portrait of Louis after Callet, engraved by Charles Clement Bervic in 1790. Mr. Lossing, the historian, who received this picture at Mount Vernon, writes as follows regarding it.

Mr. Humphrey brought with him from France, at the special request of the king, a token of his most Christian majesty's regard for Washington. It was an engraving of a full length portrait of the King Louis XVI in his state robes, enclosed in a superb gilt frame, made expressly for the occasion. At the top, surrounded by appropriate emblems, are the royal arms of France, and at the bottom the arms of the Washington family. In the corners are the monograms of the king and Washington, "L. L. XVI and G. W." These, the arms and emblematic ornaments are in relief.

Another gift to Washington from a distinguished Frenchman, which we looked at, was an original India ink drawing of the destruction of the Bastille, presented to Washington by Lafayette. In Lafayette's letter to Washington regarding this drawing, he says: "Give me leave, my dear General, to present you with a picture of the Bastille just as it looked a few days after I ordered its demolition, with the main key of the fortress of despotism. It is a tribute which I owe as a son to my adopted father, as an aid-de-camp to my general, as a missionary of liberty to its patriarch." This picture was inherited by Lawrence Washington from his father, Col. John Augustine Washington, who presented the key of the Bastille (mentioned in Lafayette's letter of presentation) to the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association, although in that institution there is nothing to show the fact.

"Washington's sword," said Lawrence Washington, as he placed in my hand an antiquated weapon. This most valuable relic, I was further informed, was bequeathed by the General to Judge Bushrod Washington. During the late Civil War this sword, with a lot of other valuables, was hid in a pigeon house, where it was so injured by exposure that the scabbard was destroyed, and the blade so rusted that the inscription upon it was obliterated.

There are many books in the collection from Washington's library, and a very rare gathering of broadsides. A book that is worthy of mention is a copy of Homer, printed in London in 1742. This volume was one of Washington's school books, and contains the following Latin inscription written on the fly leaf:

Hunc mihi quaeso (bone vir) Libellum Redde, si forsan tenues repertum ut scias qui sum sine fraude scriptum.

Est mihi nomen,

Georgio Washington,
Fredericksburg,
Virginia.

Written on the inside of the cover is the following:

Bushrod Washington's book, given him by G. Washington.

The last relic which was resurrected from the miscellaneous heap of treasures scattered about the room, was an original pitcher portrait of Washington. The portrait is an excellent likeness of Washington after Stuart, on a china pitcher. These pitchers were made by a Liverpool pottery for Mr. Edward A. Newton, a nephew of Stuart, who, when the pitchers were distributed, sent a dozen to the United States. Several specimens are in the possession of Philadelphians. One is in the Philadelphia library. The Historical Society of Pennsylvania has another, and Elliston Perot Morris, of Germantown, also owns one. The one in the possession of Mr. Washington is merely the portrait, which has been broken with care from the pitcher and hung in a gilt frame. It hung for some time at Mount Vernon, and one day an unknown visitor took it down from the wall and wrote on its back an eloquent eulogy on Washington, in a neat, small, but distinct hand. For many years this poem was allowed to remain on the picture, but one day some vandal cut out the center portion of it. The first part, which reads as follows, can still be deciphered:

WASHINGTON:

The Defender of His Country: the Founder of Liberty.

The friend of man.

History and Tradition are explored in vain

For a Parallel to his Character.

In the annals of modern greatness

He Stands Alone;

And the noblest names of antiquity

Lose their lustre in his presence.

Rich Men on Riches.

The wideawake Morning Journal, of New York, has been interviewing some rich Americans on the question, "Does wealth bring happiness?"

GEORGE M. PULLMAN.

George M. Pullman, of palace car fame, replied, in substance: "I am not one iota happier now than I was in the days when I had not a dollar that I could call my own, save that for which I worked from sunny morn to dewy eve. Now that my circumstances have improved, I can only wear one suit of clothes at a time, and that suit is no better than the one I wore then. I ate three square meals daily at that time, and I cannot eat any more now. Then I had no responsibility and no cares. Now that I have the weight of vast interests and business cares constantly resting upon me, both in and out of working hours, I do not sleep so well as then. All things considered, I believe I was much happier when I was poor."

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER.

Mr. Rockefeller, who greased his way to wealth with oceans of kerosene, replied: "Money is like strawberries and cream. It is impossible for anybody even to have enough. A man making money is like a little girl being fed with ice-cream by her aunt in Punch's picture. 'Don't you think you have had enough, Ethel?' asks the aunt. 'I may think so, auntie, but I don't feel so.' As most men grow richer their ambitions, tastes and desires expand largely, even to an extent wholly disproportionate to their acquisitions, and many men have felt much poorer when they had accumulated a fortune of $5,000,000 than they did when they had but $1,000,000. For this reason, as well as for many others I might name, wealth is more likely to bring unhappiness than happiness."

JOHN W. MACKAY.

John W. Mackay's idea is thus expressed: "I marvel that any one should think happiness depends upon wealth. During my earlier struggles I was happier than I have been since. I enjoyed fighting poverty and hardships to win wealth. When a laborer in a New York shipyard, when swinging a pick and shovel as a miner, I was as happy as I can ever be. I had faith in, and hope for, the future, and when I began to realize that hope by working hard, saving my money and watching my opportunities, what a happiness I experienced—such a happiness as the possession of my subsequent fortune has failed to give me."

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

When some actors play a part we are often impelled to wish they would play apart from public observation.

Joe Hart, of Hallen and Hart, has almost rewritten Later On. He has also introduced in the piece a number of new songs.

There is some talk to the effect that Minna Gale, who for the past ten seasons has been leading lady for the late Lawrence Barrett, will go starring next season.

A well-known dramatist has published anonymously a drama founded upon events indicated as leading up to Ibsen's "Rosmersholm," under the title of Rosmer of Kosmersholm.

William Gillette has another new comedy to submit to the public. Mr. Wilkinson's Widows, a reconstruction or adaptation from the French of Feu Toupinel, by Alexander Bisson.

Pass checks in Japanese theaters consist of impressions made in red ink with a rubber stamp upon the hand of the theater-goer. It is very seldom that a Japanese man goes out between the acts more than once during an evening.

Two plays are to be presented whose appeals are wide apart. One is built upon a cheap book that has had some vogue on account of its suggestive title. It is called Thou Shalt Not, and it naturally and purposely has stirred the gossips of cafes and street corners. The other is a French idyll, a simple and beautiful love story, called The Betrothed, in which a mother, to save her son from the fear of insanity, invents a lie involving her own character. So far as these plays are known to us one appeals to an itching curiosity, the other to a universal and admirable sentiment.

Richard III, who figures so ungraciously in dramatic literature, was, oddly enough, the first practical patron of the stage. He was the first prince to have a troupe of players of his own, and he treated these servants with much generosity, permitting them to travel about when he had no need of their services, playing safely under the sanction of his name. Until that time actors had been considered little better than vagabonds, but Richard's patronage set the fashion, which was quickly followed by the nobility. Richard dignified the profession.

It is not generally known that originators of spectacular productions and inventors of novel ballet groupings, like Italian opera tenors, have become less and fine by degrees. Halanzier, the potentate of the Grand Opera House, Paris, once ruled the European spectacular stage, but he has retired and there are none in France to take his place. Italy has the greatest and only creator of dramatic pageants in Europe in Sig. Manzotti. The chief organizer of scenic productions in England is Augustus Harris. Berlin and Vienna cannot boast of a single creator of this type of theatrical entertainment. In this country Imre Kiralfy is the recognized head of the pictorial and ballet guild.

"The infatuation of women and young girls for any kind of a stage celebrity fairly passes my comprehension," said a prominent theatrical manager the other day. "It is a popular impression," he continued, "that only men known to the profession as stage beauties were the objects of these misplaced affections. It is by no means true. There are plenty of instances within my knowledge where women have fairly gone crazy over the most insignificant specimens of humanity that ever walked the boards. Their silly exhibitions of sentimentalities are usually made the sport of these worthies, who compare notes in self-flattery. There is scarcely a freak in a dime museum anywhere in the country who is not the object of adoration of some woman or dozens of women.

One thing you notice at a Chinese drama is the extraordinary absence of gesture. If facial play will not express the simulated emotion, then the actor leaves it to the imagination of the audience. The interpreter tells you that the piece is several hundred years old. The principal actor furbishes it up. Ah Lum puts in a song or two. And it lasts for a week. The audience resembles the play. It comes when it pleases and goes when it pleases. It knows that it can take up the thread of the story on any day at any point. It is aware that the viceroy has to conquer his enemies and that the play will not end till he has conquered them all. When they have all surrendered or are all slain, Ah Lum packs up his cymbals and departs. There are Chinamen who have seen the entire play. They chew opium as its scenes progress. That fortifies them.

E. S. Willard, the eminent English actor, thus speaks of the question, "Does an actor really taste the poison which he takes?" "When I was playing Jim the Penman, for one hundred nights in London, I developed on the fourth or fifth night a decided pain in the region of my heart. You remember that Jim the Penman dies of heart disease and throughout the play is conscious that he may be suddenly carried off at any moment by this remorseless affection. There can be no doubt that a man in such a position would develop a morbid mental sensitiveness to the existence or even the imagined existence of any symptom apparently foretelling a crisis. This might reveal itself in an apprehensive cast of the eye or twitch of the muscles of the face, and to a conscientious actor would unquestionably afford one of the most important and difficult subjects of study. The relations between imagined heart disease, as in such a case, and the real disease which not impossibly, it seems to me, might actually be developed from excess of apprehension, form a curious and interesting field of study into which the actor can scarcely avoid following the specialist to some extent.

An amusing incident occurred in Pottsville recently, while Rose Coghlan was playing Peg Woffington there. Miss Coghlan, it will be remembered, during the play dances a jig in Triplet's poor garret to amuse the children and to cheer the poet painter. As she said the lines, "Peggy has not forgotten how to cover the buckle," a deep voice was heard to say, "No, begor; and indade I haven't aither. On looking around, somewhat annoyed by the interruption, she discovered an old Irishman who had been intently watching the play, struggling with two men in the wings, endeavoring to make an entrance upon the stage. He was forcibly detained. When he had quieted down Miss Coghlan sent for him and asked why he desired to ruin the play by such a demonstration. "Arrah, cushla ma cree," he replied, "whin I heard ye sayin' cuvver the buckle, me min'ry brought me back to me ould home in Enniscorthy, in the county Wexford, an' I thought to meself how the devil could yez cuvver the buckle alone, and I was jist comin' up to lind yez a fut whin these spalpeens laid howld iv me. Arrah, but it's all the same, me darlin', and yez can dance a jig wid the best iv thim." It is needless to say that the old man's appreciation was happily received.

The Duc de Broglie has placed the original manuscript of the Talleyrand memoirs in the hands of Calmann Levy, in order to show the public that they were written by M. de Bacourt himself, and not by "Gyp," the novelist and journalist, otherwise known as the Comtesse de Martel de Janville.

While in time past it has been the function of the preacher, the moralist and the poet to inculcate virtue and present the claims of religion, just now this duty seems to have been specially devolved upon the storyteller and the novelist. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" probably did more than scores of anti-slavery arguments and speeches to change the current of public opinion at the North, respecting slavery. Judge Tourgee, in "Mervale Eastman," has attempted to do for some form of Christian socialism in this country what Charles Reade has sought to do for social reform in England.

It is sometimes said that conversation is one of the lost arts; that people nowadays gossip, but do not talk. The same criticism might with truth be passed upon much of the so-called discussion of the day, in and out of Congress; that it is mere loud-voiced assertion, not legitimate and logical argument. To correct this evil tendency, it may well be questioned whether any better means could be suggested for our age than a course of reading of some of the old masters of thought, notably these presentations by Plato of the methods of teaching employed by his great master, Socrates.

Ouida is growing old now, and her works of late lack much of the eloquence and poetic fervor that used to make them so irresistibly attractive. She cannot at present be far from sixty. She never was a beauty, though in her prime she possessed her striking points; her "amber hair" of precisely the shade which she used to describe in her earliest novels, and a pair of exquisite little feet, of whose small size and perfect symmetry she was justly vain. She used to walk down the long dining-room of the Langham Hotel with her golden locks hanging down her back, and with her long skirts held up in one hand so as to show off her pretty feet in the daintiest of Parisian slippers. She immortalized Mr. Sanderson, of New York, who was at the time manager of the hotel, aforesaid, by making him the hero of her novel of "Tricotip." The brilliant novelist was not often given to drawing the portrait of an American in such flattering colors. She dislikes our country people with an intensity of hatred that is altogether surprising, and never misses a chance of caricaturing them and holding them up to ridicule.

Technicalities of the law are being used to an advantage. A party was charged with the theft of cigars. The County Attorney, in drawing up the complaint, charged the accused with the theft of "nin" cigars. The defendant's lawyer succeeded in having the case thrown out of court because the letter "e" was omitted from the word "nine," and showed that the accused did not appropriate "nin cigars" belonging to some one else to his own use.

Bismarck relates the following anecdote: One day the physicians in attendance on the Czar Nicholas recommended that he have his royal back rubbed. The Emperor had no one about his person whom he saw fit to intrust with the operation. In this dilemma he decided to write to King Frederick William IV, asking him to send to St. Petersburg a few subaltern officers of the Prussian Guards. These administered in turns the prescribed amount of friction; and when the cure was complete were richly rewarded for their pains. "So long as I see my Russians face to face," said the Czar, "everything goes well; but as for letting them rub my back, I won't risk it."

Utopia is found. It is that community in which a lawyer was recently discovered in his office insane from hunger. The learned counsel is said to have been too poor to buy and too proud to beg his daily bread; but it does not follow that he came to this extremity from any virtuous disinclination to unclean fees. Angels do not go to law, as he must have known when making choice of a profession; nor is it true that all fees are unclean. The source of his trouble is clearly that he lived in Utopia, which has no legal business, good, bad or indifferent. There no life-long friend of the family suddenly presents a huge claim, which out of regard for the deceased he did not mention in his lifetime. There no trusted corporate official manages the company's affairs so successfully that, in recognition of his ability, the State presents him with a suit of clothes. There the remarkable medico-legal theory that he who makes an unpleasant will does so when in the last stages of softening of the brain does not obtain. There no wife intent on costly equipage, or husband looking for a younger mate, plots treason, and has a pandering statute help the treason out.

Last Saturday the "call to arms" was again sounded over the Italian bluff, and responded to according to humor of our local Dixens in a manner that would make a mummy laugh. The speeches of the generals and majors are given with brightest humor.

In case his request should be denied, he asks to be entombed in a cave carved out of solid rock on the Isles Sauvages, in the Gulf of Ajaccio, "where my grave may be wave beaten, in image of my stormy life." If there ever was anything of a stormy character to this prince's life, it was not of sufficient import to raise even a ripple on the sea of life.

When it comes to earning one's living, a woman is far and away ahead of a man. If her hands are not available, and her accomplishments are a drug in the market, she will set her brain to work and live where a man would starve. Lately, a brainy woman in New York evolved a new idea in finances, which threatens to become a nuisance to her dear, intimate friends. Having a defined and certain social position, but a small and perhaps uncertain income, she goes to a rich lady friend and persuades her to have her bills made out in the poorer woman's name. The party whose money really pays the bills, makes her own selection of goods and they are sent to her, but the bills are made out in the other woman's name, and she receives 5 per cent commission on the total. Having secured a standing account at a number of leading dry goods and millinery stores and furniture and bric-a-brac shops, she is paid a commission on all goods she is supposed to sell; and so she makes her little pile through the friendly courtesy of an obliging acquaintance. The scheme has worked well in many instances heretofore, but some of the shopkeepers are "taking a tumble" to it, and talk of stopping the little game as a shave on themselves.

The Women's Executive Committee of the World's Fair at Chicago have already commenced fighting among themselves. Women in public matters are a failure; that is, where more than one has a say in general affairs.

"Men can be found who are willing to go to Africa as missionaries who are not willing to take care of a cross baby for half an hour." We are not surprised. If there is anything that could drive a man to Africa, or worse, it is a cross baby.

We learn with regret that Judge H. O. Beatty is lying very ill at his home in this city. While the Judge is an aged man, he is remarkably robust and vigorous, yet he has been suddenly stricken with the prevailing epidemic and its dangerous combinations.

The "Sistine Madonna" presented by Mrs. Leland Stanford to the Cathedral, was received Thursday. It will be unpacked and mounted under the direction of artist W. F. Jackson. It is a magnificent work of art and is said to be the only full-sized copy in existence. It will soon be in place at the Cathedral.

President Harrison does not propose to stand much more foolishness on the Behring sea affairs. He says: "I hereby proclaim all persons found to be or have been engaged in any violation of the laws of the United States in said waters will be arrested and punished as above provided; and that all vessels so employed, their tackle, apparel, furniture and cargoes will be seized and forfeited."

The average normal Greek is a wide-awake, active, shrewd individual. They are proud of their ancestry; and this pride finds expression in the naming of their children. It is a common custom for them to name them after the gods and demi-gods of the heroic period. You hear on the street one ragged, dirty urchin hailing another of kindred appearance with, "Hi, Themistocles," or "Oh, Phidias." You behold Plato, Demosthenes and Theseus indulging in noisy games at the street corners, while mothers come to their doors shouting at youthful Socrates to "stop pulling Aphrodite's hair," or for Athens to "stop making faces at Apollo."

From the numerous depredations that have occurred lately, and the fact that the city is rather too plentifully supplied with healthy street beggars, it would seem judicious arrests should be made for vagrancy. The police can make no mistakes if they gather in suspected characters, and place charges of vagrancy against them. There is little likelihood that the officers will be mistaken in the character of the persons they may arrest, and if it should happen an honest man is among the captured, he will have no difficulty in establishing his integrity. Let us try the new law on, and rid the community of the undesirable element.

Doubtless the receptions of President Harrison on the occasion of his visit to this coast next month will be of a character that will surprise him with our development, and will have a tendency to place California in a more favorable and important light in the East. From our remoteness from the governmental center we have not received the consideration we have deserved. With the exception of Hayes, no President has visited this coast during his term of office, and Hayes and Grant have been the only two who have set foot on Pacific soil—the latter before and after his incumbency of the office.

The resignation of United States Senator George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, announced on the 8th inst., was a surprise. Senator Edmunds has been a conspicuous figure in the National Legislature for many years. He was born at Richmond, Vermont, February 1, 1828, received a private school education and the instruction of a private tutor; was admitted to the bar; was a member of the State Legislature from 1854 to 1859, during three of which years he was Speaker; in 1861-62 he was a State Senator, and its presiding officer pro tem.; and since April 5, 1866, filled a seat in the United States Senate. Vermont was admitted as a State March 4, 1791, and has had but twenty two Federal Senators. California has had nineteen in her comparatively brief State career. Edmunds filled the office twenty-five years, and doubtless feels that having entered the body at the early age of 38, at 63 it is of consequence to him to devote a few years to the practice of his profession, and relieve himself of the cares of office.

Frank R. Folger.

Frank R. Folger, a well known old time Sacramentan, died at Santa Rosa on the 6th instant, at the age of 67 years. For many years Mr. Folger was the city editor of the Sacramento Union, later on of the Reporter, and for a long time was a clerk in the railroad freight office. Retiring from that post he removed to Sonoma county, and followed farming. His funeral was held in this city yesterday afternoon. He leaves a number of relatives in Sacramento. Mr. Folger was a genial gentleman and a universal favorite.

Daniel Webster's Clients.

"My family," said a prominent club man, "has lost about a quarter of a million dollars, I believe, as the result of the intemperate habits of one man—no less a man than the great Daniel Webster himself. The United States Government has just ordered the payment of French spoliation claims amounting to $1,500,000, and $3,500,000 additional has been scheduled for payment later. This money was originally paid to the United States by the French Government to reimburse the owners of certain American vessels that had been seized by Napoleon. The United States Government used this money in making the Louisiana purchase. Now the Government is paying the claims of the descendants of the original vessel-owners. One of my ancestors owned five vessels that were seized, and his claim was placed in the hands of Daniel Webster. The immortal Daniel looked over all the papers, and seeing that the claim was entirely valid, undertook to secure its payment by Congress. But at that time the United States was not so careful of its financial standing as it now is, and the eloquence of the great orator proved unavailing. One day, after a vain attempt to secure favorable action upon the claim, Mr. Webster went to his room, filled up with liberal potations of old rye, and, under the exhilarating influence of the same, threw all the papers of the case into an open grate, swearing that the United States Government knew no such words as honor or honesty, and that it would betterly useless to waste any more time in prosecuting the claim. So about $250,000 worth of hopes went up Mr. Webster's chimney in plain black smoke. Now, these French spoliation claims are being paid off dollar for dollar. Whenever I think of the terrible effect of Daniel's costly debauch, I feel like drowning the memory of it in some way. Will you join me.—Chicago Mail.

Liberty's Face Fades.

The reign of a Philadelphia belle, which has endured for thirteen years, is tottering on the verge of downfall. She is Miss Annie L. Williams, and her face is familiar to every person who has ever owned a dollar. Since the spring of 1878 every silver dollar coined by the United States Mint has borne the imprint of her classic features, but no longer will they be used as emblematic of "Liberty."

After July 1st no more silver dollars will be coined except at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. This is under the Act of August 14, 1890. Until July 1st the usual amount of silver, 2,000,000 ounces per month, will be coined into dollars. New designs will be made for the half dollars, quarters and dimes, but as yet none have been decided on. Edward O. Leach, Director of the Mint, has the matter in charge, and several designs have been submitted to him.

There is an interesting story connected with the way in which Miss Williams' profile came to be used on the Bland dollar. In the winter of 1877-78 George T. Morgan, the designer, was working on sketches for the imprint of the then new silver dollar. Previous to this there had been no dollars coined for five years. Professor Thomas Eakins, then of the Academy of the Fine Arts, advised him to use a life study, and introduced him to Miss Annie L. Williams, a school teacher living at Thirteenth and Spring Garden streets. Miss Williams, who possessed strikingly classical features, consented to sit for the drawing, and her profile was used to complete the design. From an obscure "school marm" she became paradoxically the most widely known and at the same time unknown woman of America.—Record.

The True Irish Shamrock.

In Ireland only one shamrock is known. It is an indigenous species of clover, which trails along the ground among the grass in meadows. The trefoil leaves are not more than one-fourth the size of the smallest clover I have seen in America, and are pure green in color, without any of the brown shading of white and pink clovers. The creeping stem is hard and fibrous, and is difficult to dislodge from the earth. On St. Patrick's day the true shamrock has to be searched out among the grass, for, though comparatively plentiful at that season, it grows close to the ground.

Later it bears a tiny "white brown" blossom. The information that shamrock is the Arabic word for trefoil may be of service to those interested in the origin of the Irish race. The word could have been introduced by the Milesians, or it may furnish an argument in support of the contention that one of the lost ten tribes of Israel settled in Ireland, which has been revived by the publication of a recent book.—American Notes and Queries.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California.—In the matter of William Enright, an insolvent debtor.—William Enright having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said William Enright is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said William Enright, insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent to him, or to any person, firm, corporation or association for his use; and the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court-room of said Court, in the County of Sacramento, on the 8th day of May, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock, P. M., of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered, that the order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation, published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published, before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And it is further ordered, that, in the meantime, all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated April 6th, 1891.

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO.—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California, to Helen A. Grant, Allen D. Grant, Edward N. Grant, Catherine Matzen, Mary M. Miller, John Doe, and Richard Roe, greeting.

You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the county of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 29th day of January, 1891, in which action EDWARD DIETERLE is plaintiff and you are defendants.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: The said action is brought for the purpose of quieting the title to that certain piece or parcel of land situated, lying and being in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, and State of California, and described according to the plan of said city, as the south twenty (20) feet of the west sixty-eight (68) feet of lot number one, in the block bounded by J and K, and 5th and 6th streets; for the purpose, also, of determining all adverse claims of the said defendants to said property; and for a decree of said Court, declaring and adjudging that the title of plaintiff to said premises is good and valid, and that neither the said defendants have, nor any of them has, any estate or interest in the same; and forever enjoining and debarring the said defendants, and each of them, from asserting any claim to said land adverse to plaintiff, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made.

And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand (SEAL) and affix the seal of said Court this 20th day of February, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Last night The Two Sisters was given for the first time in Sacramento to a good house. There is much sentiment and emotion in the play. The company is good. Two Sisters to-night.

The McMahon Circus has drawn large crowds during its engagement. The circus is thoroughly good. While the combination is not large, it makes up in quality what may be lacking in quantity. Matinee this afternoon, and the usual attraction for to-night.

The Johnston-McBurnie Company has been drawing large houses all week. There are some sterling artists in this company. Indeed, it is far in advance of many of the flaunted "star" combinations that are storming the circuit. To-night will be the last of the engagement.

Barnum, the King of Showmen, died at Bridgeport, Connecticut, last Tuesday. He was, during his lifetime, engaged in the most stupendous enterprises relating to the show business. His name, for many years, has been a household word. There is no man living who can take his place in the enterprises of his life.

For the principal scene in the royal performance of A Pair of Spectacles, the Queen allowed the superb Chippendale furniture from the tea-room at Fort Belvedere, the fishing cottage on Virginia Water, to be brought to Windsor Castle; and, indeed, several of the stage accessories belonged to the Queen, and were of unique character.

The Minnesota Legislature passed a bill prohibiting the wearing of tights on the stage. The Senate, for the purposes of ridicule, added the following section to the law: "Whoever shall display any immoral or immodest piece of statuary exhibiting the female form wholly or partially nude, or shall display any figure of Venus without petticoats, shall be deemed guilty of misdemeanor."

The following is Robert G. Ingersoll's tribute to Lawrence Barrett: "Lawrence Barrett," said the orator, and he paused impressively. "My heart tells me that on the threshold of my address, it will be appropriate for me to say a few words about the great actor who has just fallen into that sleep. Lawrence Barrett was my friend, and I was his. He was an interpreter of Shakespeare, to whose creations he gave flesh and blood. He was the greatest tragedian of our time next to Edwin Booth. He shunned the questionable, the vulgar and impure. He was a thoughtful 'Hamlet,' an intense 'Othello,' and the best 'Cassius' of the century. One by one the players leave the stage, and others take their places. There is no pause; no one knows what the next scene is to be. Will this drama have an end? Will the curtain fall at last, and will it rise again on some other stage? Reason says perhaps; hope still whispers yes. Sadly I bid my friend farewell. I admire the actor—I love the man. [Great applause]"

When Gus Williams and John T. Kelly presented their alleged comedy, U and I, in this city, we took occasion to say that it was a miserable travesty on the drama. We find that the New York Times, whose critic is of the best, has the following to say, which is in tone with our comments: "Bad taste can go no further than it does in the motley entertainment entitled U and I, now offered at the Standard theater. It is not likely that persons of refined taste will be attracted by the title. For the benefit of any who may be induced to go to the Standard theater this week, however, it may be said that this acrobatic farce is dull, noisy, witless and incoherent. Only one woman employed in the performance, Rose Leighton is a pleasing singer, and she cannot act. The other women are as ill looking as any ever seen in exhibitions of this kind, which is saying a great deal. The men are tedious and vulgar. This is the funniest piece of dialogue in the so-called play: A German has portraits of Schiller, Goethe and Frederick the Great on the walls of his room. An Irishman asks: 'Why don't you have a picture of Emmet?' Says the German: 'I'll not have the portrait of an actor in my house as long as I live.' Nobody laughed at this last night. The boys in the gallery laughed at everything else. They laugh when they go to the morgue. There is no merriment in their laughter. Most of the illustrious 'deadheads' in the house left the theater at the end of the second act. New York taste is pretty low, as the underfed young persons who write for the Boston newspapers frequently remark, but it will not tolerate U and I. Mr. Hill would better send it after Ship A-hoy—to Boston."

City Affairs.

The new Board of City Trustees have entered upon their work, as we anticipated, harmoniously. So far as is apparent, the differences they may have had were settled in caucus and amicably—an improvement upon the system that had prevailed, of holding Monday morning meetings at which there was much talk but little that was practical accomplished. The sessions of late have been characterized with dignity, and they have been surrounded with an atmosphere of business. There has been some talk of the necessity for an increase of the machinery in the water-works, to meet the present and anticipated requirement for water. True it has been, the mains have been extended and the consumption has increased of late years, in that the population has augmented and the inhabited area much extended since the present pumps were placed, yet the consumption of water, as indicated by the weekly reports of the Chief Engineer of the works, would tend to show that there is a very large margin of wastage. Last week, for instance, he reports 25,577,000 gallons pumped into the city mains. In the summer months, as a matter of course, the amount has been greater. In our judgment, regulations should be adopted and enforced to prevent wastage; reasonable economy in that direction would give the city an ample, yea, a liberal supply, and so relieve the works that they could furnish adequately. We do not believe the necessity has arisen for additional pumping machinery; so long as the necessity can be obviated by a little exercise of regulation, we do not see the propriety of incurring an expense that is unnecessary.

The suggestion that street sprinkling contracts should be let for the year, and that the sprinkling be done when needed, is excellent and should be adopted. The arguments in favor of annual contracts have been strikingly exemplified the last month, during the prevalence of the north wind. The dust was intolerable; it blew into stores and dwellings, and entailed loss to goods and general inconvenience; the surfaces of the newly-graveled streets were pulverized by travel and blown away. These streets particularly should be sprinkled until time has been allowed for the material to become impacted, and that cannot be expected in a single season.

Now that street, sidewalk and sidewalk improvements are well under way, and in a shape that there will be continual progression made, attention should be paid to the levees. During the coming summer permanent improvements upon them should be made. With the same energy our people displayed in what may be termed "internal" improvements, before next winter we can get well under way work that will eventuate in strengthening our defenses to a point that they will be impregnable. A movement in that direction should certainly be made.

Sacramento's Streets.

Editor of THEMIS—SIR: Politics have again relapsed into their normal condition, the selection of a City Treasurer and election of the police officers being the last act in the political arena for some months. The "Bosses," "Wire Pullers," "Heelers" and other members of that ilk are in the meantime so many "Othellos"—their occupations are gone. Politics being quiescent, what is the next matter for us to consider? Street sprinkling; a very good one for consideration, and one it is pleasing to know is being agitated by many of our prominent citizens, and it is to be hoped success will crown their laudable efforts.

Is not this dust and sprinkling a case of cause and effect? If so, would it not be wise to remove as much of the cause as possible, that a better effect may be obtained? Sprinkling some of our principal streets in the condition that they usually are, will change the dust into mud, a questionable superiority, to say the least. Why not the advisability of sweeping, cleaning and sprinkling the streets be taken up by these gentlemen, and let us have our streets and sidewalks to appear that Sacramento is in the march of progress in this very necessary work.

The first impressions to a stranger visiting a city generally are the conditions of the streets and appearance of the buildings. Unfortunately, in the business portions of Sacramento, neither our streets nor our buildings, with few exceptions, are what we can be proud of, en passant, many of the latter could be materially improved in appearance by painting. A clean city must have good streets and side pavements, a plentiful supply of water for flushing, a good system of drainage and an organized street-cleaning department. Sacramento has all the water required, but in drainage, street cleaning and paved streets is very deficient.

The Citizens' Association have done, and are doing, splendid work, and deserve the hearty co-operation of all; and if our municipal authorities would push their work in the same businesslike and systematic manner, good and beneficial results would ensue.

Can our streets be cleaned, sprinkled and kept as they should be, and as desired? Certainly. How? I will give my opinion, which, I admit, is not worth much, but it may set clearer heads thinking.

Let the city purchase a first-class revolving sweeper, to be used on the paved streets, which can be sprinkled with less expense than now, as fewer trips would be required on the paved streets, and more attention could be given to the other portions of the city. A roller for the unpaved streets, some lengths of hose for flushing the surface drains and washing down, dust carts, to be owned by the city or hired by contract, and you have the necessary essentials for work. Now, to use them: Lay the city off into sections, making the paved streets one, as they should be cleaned differently from the unpaved, the remaining parts into convenient sections; all under control of the Street Commissioner.

Work should commence at four o'clock in the morning. On the paved streets, a sprinkling cart, followed by the sweeper, should go the entire length of each street, sweeping the dust and dirt from the center to one side, returning on the other side and doing the same work. A gang with stiff brooms should follow, to sweep the accumulation into convenient heaps for immediate removal by the dust carts, which would remove all house garbage at the same time. Once each week the entire paved streets and side pavements should be washed. This washing should be a thorough one. The hose would be attached to the different fire plugs in each block, commencing at one end of a street and going from block to block. The hoseman going first, and with a coarse nozzle and strong force of water wash away all incrustated dirt; the gang with wire brooms coming after, working in the following style >, which enables them in a short space of time to push the dirt from one to the other into the drain, from where it can be removed by the carts. Side pavements could be washed at the same time. Surface drains should be flushed at least twice a week in all parts of the city. The unpaved streets should be kept well sprinkled each day, and rolled once in every two weeks. Dirt and rubbish to be collected every morning from the drains and sidewalks.

Is it practicable to introduce such a system in Sacramento? Street care is a very simple matter. It only requires system rigidly enforced. The sweeper and the cart should go together, and any honest man of average sense and a little business ability could keep the city clean; but politics would render such a department useless, careless and untidy. Respectable men of all opinions find it difficult to leave their business in obedience to the calls of public duty. Divorce, then, city affairs from State and national; put aside State and national politics when municipal elections are being conducted. Every city should have a municipal party, with which all good elements could combine, who would ignore State matters in local questions. Good Republicans should vote for good Democrats in preference to a corrupt member of their own party. Good Democrats should act in a similar spirit. By such means only can honest and capable men be elected, and such men are necessary if a city is to be well-governed, and a well-governed city means good municipal regulations.

Hoping I have not taken too much of your valuable space. TERRA NOVA.

Knights of Pythias.

The Grand Lodge Knights of Pythias of California will meet in Sacramento on Monday next. This will be an important occasion to all members of the order. About 275 delegates are expected to be in attendance from the various lodges throughout the State. A ball will be given on Wednesday evening next, under the auspices of the Uniform Rank; and on Thursday evening, a banquet will be held in the Assembly Chamber of the Capitol. The local committee have made arrangements to seat 400 on that occasion.

Chauncey Depew's Latest Yarn.

Dr. Chauncey Depew told of a little conversation he overheard while in the Berkshire Hills the other day. They were all gathered in the parlor to help the widow mourn, when a late-comer, glancing around the darkened room, said to the widow:

"Where did you get that new eight-day clock?"

"We ain't got no new eight-day clock."

"You ain't? Well, what's that in the corner?"

"That ain't no eight-day clock; that's him. We stood him on end to make more room."

—New York Journal.

Mrs. Swann's Hermit Life.

The death of Mrs. Wilson C. Swann, of Philadelphia, has started on its rounds a weird story concerning that lady, who has not left her apartments in her palatial residence for more than forty years. Why she has excluded herself from society during all these years is a mystery. Her friends say she has been an invalid all this time, but it is certain that she was active in mind and body up to within a very short time of her death. She has written letters under recent dates of real literary merit, and in a happy strain, showing that all the brilliant faculties of the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William John Bell still clung to her, notwithstanding her 77 years. As Miss Bell she was a reigning belle of Philadelphia. Her husband, the late Dr. Wilson C. Swann, was famed far and wide as an art critic, a philanthropist and a social leader. It was he who first proposed establishing public fountains in the streets, and as a doctor of medicine he stood pre-eminent. It is said that from the time Dr. and Mrs. Swann went away on their wedding tour Mrs. Swann has never been seen by her friends in society. She was brought home and taken to the third floor of her residence, where she remained until the day of her death, seeing no one but her housekeeper. It is said that she never left the suite of rooms she first occupied, and, although the house was often crowded with the gayest of gay assemblies, she never once appeared, and here the story needs must stop, for no one will explain why this once famous beauty sought seclusion. If she was but an invalid, it is certainly queer that none of her former friends were admitted to her presence.—Record.

Man a Destroyer.

It is but a few years ago that a train of cars on the Union Pacific railroad was brought to a standstill by an immense herd of buffaloes that blocked the track. Massed solidly as far as the eye could reach, they constituted a living barrier that not even one of the most powerful forces controlled by man could move. Yet to day the buffalo is comparatively extinct. The herd of millions has dwindled to two or three hundred; while the warm hide, that once could be had almost for the asking, has taken its place among the rare and costly furs of commerce. Men feel well rewarded if from a nucleus of two or three they can propagate even a few of the species. The cupidity and love of destruction that characterize the human race have caused a loss that is incalculable; and it is safe to say that to them may be directly traced one origin of modern Indian troubles, the savage's loss of his former source of food supply.

Next in importance to the buffalo is the seal, now rapidly diminishing in numbers; not by reason of any natural law of destruction, but because killing goes on without sufficient regard to the ultimate interests of trade. Of the millions that abounded along the northern coasts within the memory of many, it is estimated that less than 200,000 remain, the lance and club of the hunter having exterminated the rest.

In the latitude of Behring strait there formerly existed another animal, similar to the seal, commonly known as the sea cow. It attained a length of from nine to sixteen feet—valuable to the northern tribes, especially to the Esquimaux, the flesh being acceptable food, and the skin being used in the manufacture of canoes. Yet the pursuit of these animals has been followed unceasingly, until they are now nothing but a memory. They were distinguished by a bare skin, black in color and wrinkled like the bark of an oak, and a mustache with hairs as thick as the quill of a pigeon's feather.

Like the seal, these harmless animals delighted in herding together. They browsed along the shore like cattle in the fields, and when satisfied came to the beach to rest and bask in the sunshine. All we know of this animal's history has been handed down by the memoir of Steller, the naturalist and physician, who accompanied Behring on his voyage to the northwest of America, and on the wreck of the ship and death of his commander named Behring strait in his honor.

Long continued pursuit has likewise nearly exterminated the whale; which, less than a century ago, was the object of profitable ventures. Whalers, like the sealers, not content with the capture of old cetaceans, took younger ones of little value, and consequently the "visible supply" suffered marked decrease.

The beaver, not only interesting from its habits, but valuable for the products it yielded to commerce and manufactures, was abundant in France and Central Europe down to the middle ages, but its existence in former haunts is almost unknown. In the early part of the century the beaver abounded in North America; and the traces of its industry are yet to be seen along the banks of streams in the West, notably among the Rocky mountains. Like the otter and other of this species, the animal is rapidly disappearing, and flourishing only in the Northwest, where man has not yet begun his ravages.

In early days deer roamed in herds through the American forests. Now they are to be found only in single specimens; and notwithstanding the laws that seek to protect them, they are rapidly falling before the rifle of the huntsman.

Everyone who visits a museum of natural history experiences surprise at the number of animals of enormous size that belong to species now extinct or rare, and yet similar in their general characteristics to forms that exist. Other specimens comprise animals that are familiar to many old men, but are little known to the younger generation, save as they are seen in zoological gardens and menageries. Of these are the moose, the elk and antelope, the panther and the grizzly bear. Horns of the stag have been found with a spread of nine feet, but specimens of the magnificent animal to which they belong are comparatively rare. The chamois and the pretty wild goat of the Alps still exist in European fauna, but their destruction is only a question of time.

It is now conclusively proved that man was already in existence during the epoch in which elephants were clothed with a thick fleece, and the mastodon, rhinoceros, tapirs, huge bisons and a genera of gigantic sloth as large as lions were found in North America. Specimens of their bones have been discovered in New Jersey, and of the camel and horse it has been demonstrated that they reached the highest development on this continent before their passage into Asia.

The great wild ox of Europe has left abundant remains in the bottoms of water-courses, peat bogs and caves. The animal's size surpassed by a third that of the domestic breeds. "They have," said Cæsar, in describing the Hercynian forest (a vast range of wooded mountains in Germany), "a stature little below that of elephants. In appearance, color and form they are like bulls. Of great swiftness and extremely powerful, they spare neither men nor beasts when seen. Those who kill many of them display their horns publicly in proof and receive applause." The buffalo, classically termed bubalus, is a native of Asia, and long ago was known to the Greeks, being plainly designated in the writings of Seneca and Pliny.

Many birds, remarkable either for great size or exceptional peculiarities in conformation, have disappeared. Incapable of fright and confined to islands, they were unable to escape the attacks of man. Among these is the dodo, which in the early part of the sixteenth century was discovered on the islands of the Indian ocean, and has furnished modern authors a theme for numberless writings. It exceeded the swan in size and presented the most extraordinary appearance. It had a massive body, supported on thick, short legs like pillars, a swollen neck, a round head set off by a fringe of feathers brought forward over the face like a hood, great black eyes ringed with white and a huge bill that has been compared to two spoons laid with the hollow of the bowls against each other. Its wings were rudimentary and could be used for nothing, and its tail was a mere tuft. Buffon, the naturalist, likened it to a turtle muffled in a bird's skin. The Dutch navigators killed the dodo with a club, and the meat furnished a large part of the crew's provisions. A living specimen was exhibited in London about the year 1638, and the last evidence of its existence dates in 1681.

On the shores of the Arctic regions in passages abounded the great auks, fitted for swimming, but unable to fly. They have been annihilated. At a date nearer our own period the auk was found on the banks of Newfoundland and in Lapland and Greenland; but for thirty or forty years not a single one has been seen anywhere, and the few stuffed figures preserved in museums of natural history are regarded as objects of value. The bird is the size of the goose, having the upper part of its body velvet black, its throat shaded with brown and its lower parts white. In former times the great auk furnished the people of the north with a large part of their food, and thousands of the bones are yet found splintered, scratched and gnawed among the refuse heaps of the inhabitants who, like their birds, have passed away.

A Horse-Car Episode.

I hung on one strap and she hung on the next,
For seats were a scarcity there.
The car rattled on in the usual way
With me and this maiden so fair—
This maid with the dignified air.

When, all on a sudden, there came a dull sound,
And something had dropped—that I knew;
I stooped down politely and picked the thing up,
Pray tell me what else I could do?
What else could I possibly do?

I handed it back to the dignified maid,
And great was my longing to fly;
But what could I do? So I bowed and I smiled,
"Is this, Miss, your g-g-garter?" said I—
"This must be your garter," said I.

She took it; but never again in this life,
Although I should linger to be
A hundred or more, shall I ever forget
The look that this girl fixed on me—
The look that she fastened on me.

A Bunko-Steerer Taken In.

A rather green looking young fellow sauntered into a bar-room up town the other evening and looked around the walls and up at the ceiling and at the ornaments behind the bar in a way that betokened a stranger seeing the sights of the metropolis. He sat down at one of the little tables and ordered a drink, which he sipped in a lonely way.

A keen-eyed, quietly dressed, elderly man had followed the stranger in and now he sat down at the other side of the same table. He too ordered a drink, but seemed to take no notice whatever of his neighbor. As he sat down his glass, however, he awkwardly knocked it over and a little of the dregs of the liquor it had contained ran across the table. Hastily apologizing, the awkward man called the waiter to wipe off the table, and at the same time he expressed a hope that the accident had not annoyed anybody. This remark he addressed so pointedly to the man opposite, that the latter could not but reply.

"Don't mention it," he said, looking for the first time straight into the face of his neighbor. "Accidents will happen."

"By Jove," exclaimed the other, "if you're not young Harold Smith, I'll eat my hat."

"That's my name," replied the stranger, in a surprised voice, "but I don't recognize you."

"Don't remember James Wilson?"

"No."

"Of Wilson & Bangs?"

"No."

"Hardware merchants?"

"No."

"Of Scranton?"

"No."

"Scranton, Pennsylvania?"

"No."

"You're a son of Harold Smith, real estate agent, of Scranton, aren't you?"

"Yes."

"And yet you don't remember me?"

"No."

"Why, I was the senior member of Wilson & Bangs in 1875, and was a close friend and good customer of your worthy father, young fellow, and, though you don't remember me, I remember seeing you many's the time in the old office there near the Court-house, before I left Scranton some years ago."

"Is that so?"

"Yes, indeed, that's so. And if there is anything I can do for the son of my old friend, I'd like to know it."

"That's kind of you, Mr. Wilson," said the young fellow. "Pa's struck it rich since you left Scranton and I have come up to New York for the first time to see the town. The old gentleman is generous with me, you know, and I have plenty of money to do the thing in style, but I don't know any one here, and I'm afraid to make friends with strangers for fear I should meet dishonest people, but now that I've found an old friend of my father's, why it's all right. You'll show me around, won't you?" and he pulled out a big roll of bills to pay for his drink.

"That I will, my boy, right gladly, for my old friend's sake, as well as your own," said the elder man as his eyes snapped at sight of the money.

"Now, that I come to think of it, I remember hearing my father speak of you, Mr. Wilson."

"No doubt."

"Your firm got into temporary embarrassment and made an assignment."

"Yes."

"There's an unpaid balance on our books of $11 against you yet."

"I don't remember it."

"I'm my father's bookkeeper and there's no doubt about it. Now, if you're an honest man, Mr. Wilson, you'll pay me that $11 right here and I'll give you a receipt for it. If you won't, I don't want to have anything more to say to you."

Mr. Wilson looked the green young man over slowly from top to toe. He saw nothing but innocent honesty and he thought of that big roll of bills. "Here's the $11," he said, drawing a ten and a one out of his wallet, and handing them over. "Never mind the receipt, but let's go for a stroll up Broadway."

The young fellow took the $11, folded them up with his own roll and remarked: "Good night, Mr. Wilson, I have no further use for you."

The older man jumped up, almost livid in the face with rage. He opened his mouth as if to yell a shower of expletives, but the young fellow with a quiet smile raised his finger warningly and said: "Don't make a bigger fool of yourself than you have already, Mr. Wilson. Bunko works both ways. You can't expect to win every time. Tra la, now. Trot along."

The older bunko-steerer hung his head and walked off without a word, dazed by the preternatural effrontery of his younger rival.

Some Ancient Beliefs.

The curious beliefs of the mediæval English as to the cause and cure of various diseases were often even more shocking than absurd, if such could be possible. A ring made of the hinge or handle of a coffin was credited with the power of relieving cramps, which also received a solace when a rusty old sword was hung up by the patient's bedside. Nails driven into an oak tree were not a cure, but a preventive of toothache. A halter which had been used in hanging a murderer, when bound around the temples, was said to be an infallible remedy for headache. A dead man's hand could dispel tumors of the glands by stroking the parts nine times with it, but the hand of a man who had been hanged and then cut down from the gallows by a maiden was a remedy infinitely more efficacious. Some of these remedies still exist among the superstitious poor of the provinces, but are not now strictly adhered to. To cure warts, for an instance, the best thing to do is to steal a piece of beef from the butcher, with which the warts are to be rubbed, after which the meat is to be interred in sandy soil; as the process of decomposition goes on the warts will wither and finally disappear.

The chips of a gallows upon which several persons had been hanged was also one of the items in mediæval materia medica; these, when worn in a bag around the neck, were pronounced an infallible cure for ague. The nightmare, supposed, of course, to be the result of something supernatural, was banished by means of a stone with a hole in it, which was every night suspended at the head of the sufferer's bed. This last remedy went by the name of "hag-stone," because it prevented the witches from coming and sitting on the patient's stomach. The witches, which from popular pictures could not have sat upon a horse a moment, were credited with riding them across the moors at break-neck speed at the dead hour of midnight, when better disposed and less frisky persons were asleep. In cases of this kind a "hag-stone" tied to a stable door at once put a stop to these heathenish vagaries.

"THE KING'S TOUCH."

In England, two centuries ago, popular superstition credited the "Royal Touch" with curing scrofula. These superstitious practices have now become obsolete, and in their place we have a scientific remedy in Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, which eliminates the impurities from the blood by the natural channels, thereby cleansing the system from all taints and impurities from whatever cause arising. It is truly a royal remedy, world-famed and the only liver, lung and blood remedy guaranteed to benefit or cure in every case, or money paid for it will be refunded. As a regulator of the Stomach, Liver and Bowels, "Golden Medical Discovery" cures all bilious attacks, indigestion and dyspepsia, Chronic Diarrhea and kindred ailments. As an alternative, or blood-purifier, it manifests its marvelous properties in the cure of the worst Skin and Scalp Diseases, Salt-rheum, Tetter, Eczema, and Scrofulous Sores and Swellings, as well as Lung-scurf, commonly known as Pulmonary Consumption, if taken in time and given a fair trial. My Friends, the Directors.

Some months ago I was requested to act as inspector of elections in behalf of the stockholders of a certain corporation which shall be nameless, for which service I was to be paid two dollars. I was also invited to remain and dine with the Directors, at the expense of the company, afterward. I accepted the office and the invitation with alacrity, and enjoyed myself to the full—especially at the dinner. An unusually rich dinner it was, and wine flowed like soda water. The Directors, no one of whom was under sixty, were genial to the last degree, and full of good advice, taking the opportunity to show me the error of my ways in gastronomy, politics, religion, and other things which go to make of this a happy life. Their gastronomical advice, which I felt bound to accept, was somewhat as follows:

When the oysters were served the President of the company, a delightful old gentleman of seventy-two, observed, with dignity and some severity:

"Oysters! Humpf! No oysters for me. Forty years ago I ate 'em, but I am no such fool as to do it now. Take my advice, my young friend, and leave oysters alone."

I took his advice, and waited for the next course, which was lobster croquettes. The President of the company fell to and devoured his lobster croquette before mine was brought to me, much to the disgust of a Director, aged sixty-eight, who sat at the other end of the table.

"Ye may be no fool about oysters," said he of the other end, "but the man who puts lobster in his stomach puts pizen there. I'm sixty-nine next April, and I'd 'a' been in my grave thirty years if I hadn't dropped lobster ten years ago. Don't you touch 'em, Mr. —" (naming me).

There were obvious inaccuracies in the old gentleman's statement, but it was due to his years that I should decline the lobster.

A few minutes later I was delighted to see a delicious fillet smothered in mushrooms brought on the table. Mushrooms are my especial delight, and I was helping myself copiously, when I became conscious of a glare across the table. I glanced up and found myself pinned to the wall, as it were, by the eye of a Director of the vintage of 1828.

"Y' ain't eatin' mushrooms, are you?" said he. I acknowledged the soft impeachment.

"Humpf! Better stop at the undertaker's on your way home and leave your order."

I mutely appealed to my friends, the President and the lobster hater, for indorsement of my course, but they were silent; and worse still, there were no mushrooms before them. I learned afterward that they had eaten their share while I was engaged in conversation with a sixty-six year old Director on my right, who subsequently peremptorily forbade me to touch the Roman punch.

"It's ruin to put that slushy stuff into your stomach," he said of it. "Might as well eat a snowball."

So the mushrooms and the punch left me untouched.

There were but two Directors left. They had pitched in like honorable men, and I admired them; and for once I wished that I were old enough to be able to get along without respect for age, as they were. I comforted myself with the thought, however, that the game course and coffee—for I never touch ice cream myself—would suffice to stay my by this time ravenous appetite.

The bird was brought on—a beautiful luscious red-head duck, cooked to perfection. But—I put it from me untasted.

One of my old stand-byes, a man of seventy-four—old enough, I think, to know better—went back on me. He prophesied every evil thing if I ate that duck; and although the others were brave enough to go on and eat their share, I felt that, having previously accepted their advice, I could not properly ignore that of the present objector. So I succumbed to the inevitable, and waited for the coffee. It came. I was just about to swallow it when the one remaining Director—my pet, my admiration—roared out: "Drinking coffee after one o'clock is suicide." And then, as if indorsing this warning, the clock struck three.

I sadly rose from the table and bade my hosts good afternoon, and departed, a hungry man—hungry to ravenousness; and on my way home I stopped at the club and had a meal served in a private room. It consisted of Welsh rare bit and Charlotte-russe, which were all they had within reach; and I regret to say that, in spite of my abstinence at the dinner, I suffered for the next month from dyspepsia. Whether this was due to disappointed appetite or not, I have never been able to find out.

At all events, this is a true story.

The Thirteen Club of New York, famous for abolishing superstitions of one kind or another, is going to tackle the old-time superstitious notion that clubs are for men only, and do what it can toward abolishing it. For the first time in the history of the club, ladies will be permitted to view the mystic rites with which the organization hails the thirteenth of the month, on May 13th, when a ladies' dinner will be given at Sherry's.

The art of not hearing should be taught in every well-regulated family. It is as fully important to domestic happiness as a cultivated ear, for which so much money and time are expended. There are so many things that are painful to hear; many which we ought not to hear, and very many which, if heard, will disturb the temper, corrupt simplicity and modesty, detract from contentment and happiness, that every one must be educated to take in or shut out sounds according to their pleasure. If a man falls into a violent passion and calls you all manner of names, let the first word shut your ears, and hear no more. If, in your quiet voyage of life, you find yourself caught in one of the domestic whirlwinds of scolding, shut your ears as a sailor would furl his sails, and, making all tight, scud before the gale. If a hot and restless man begins to inflame your feelings, consider what mischief these fiery sparks may do in the magazine below, where your temper is kept, and instantly close the door. If a gadding, mischief-making fellow begins to inform you what people are saying about you, let the portcullis of your ear drop down, and he can get no further. Does the collector of a neighborhood scandal ask your ear as a warehouse, it should instinctively shut up. Some people seem anxious to hear everything that will vex and annoy them. If it is hinted that any one has spoken evil of any one, they set about searching the matter and finding out. If all the petty things said of one by heedless or ill-natured idlers were to be brought home to him, he would become a mere walking pin-cushion, stuck full of sharp remarks. We should as soon think of thanking a man for emptying upon our bed a bushel of nettles, or setting loose a swarm of bees in our chamber, or raising a pungent dust in our house generally, as to bring in upon us all the tattle of careless or spiteful people. If you would be happy, when among good men open your ears; when among bad, shut them. And as the throat has a muscular arrangement by which it takes care of the air passages of its own accord, so the ears should be trained to an automatic dullness of hearing. It is not worth while to hear what your servants say when they are angry; what your children say after they have slammed the door; what your neighbors say about your children; what your rivals say about your business, your dress or your affairs.

This art of not hearing, though not taught in the schools, is by no means unknown or unpracticed in society. We have noticed that a well bred woman never hears an impertinent or vulgar remark. A kind of discreet deafness saves one from many insults, from much blame, from not a little apparent connivance in dishonorable conversation. There should be doors inside our ears, a right-handed door leading to the heart, and a left-handed door, with a broad and steep passage, out into the open air. The last door should receive all ugliness, profanity, vulgarity, mischief-making, which suddenly find themselves outside of us. Judicious teachers and indulgent parents save young urchins a world of trouble by a convenient deafness. Bankers and money-lenders often are extremely hard of hearing, when unsafe borrowers are importunate. We never hear a man who runs after us in the street, bawling our name at the top of his voice; nor persons who talk evil of those who are absent; nor those who give us unasked advice about our own affairs; nor those who talk largely about things of which they are ignorant. If there are sounds of kindness, of mirth, of love, open should fly our ears! But temper, or harshness, or hatred, or vulgarity, or flattery, should shut them. If you keep your garden gate shut, your flowers and fruit will be safe. If you keep your door closed, no thief will run off with your silver, and if you keep your ears shut, your heart will lose neither its flowers nor its treasures.

There has been a ripple of interest in New York over the action of the tailors in selling their judgments against delinquent customers. There were some surprisingly good names on the list and a few of their owners have come forward with explanations, which are accepted in some quarters and jeered at in others. It seems reasonable enough, however, to accept the statement of a distinguished lawyer that the reason for his refusal to pay a bill of $120 for a single suit of clothes was the miserable fit of the garments, coupled with a considerable overcharge. The tailor obtained judgment against the lawyer for the full amount claimed, but the highest bid for the judgment was $2, and it was sold at that price. Nevertheless the lawyer's name was printed in the papers among dozens of swindlers and was telegraphed all over the country. It is doubtful if his explanation will receive anything like as much publicity as this. The practical result, however, was that the tailors lost many of their customers, and from accounts the movement was ludicrously futile in its effect. Our tailors pursue a safer plan, of requiring deposits in doubtful cases. As a rule they are eloquent enough to convince a doubting patron that the fit is absolutely perfect, and that but for the professional skill of the tailor he would not be in it when it came to a dress parade.

Judge Cravens is but doing his simple duty in declaring that he will strictly enforce the law making it a misdemeanor to sell, give or deliver to any minor child under the age of 18 years, any intoxicating drink, or who permits any such minor to visit any saloon or public house where liquors are sold, for the purpose of gambling, playing cards, billiards, pool, or any game of chance. The law is a salutary one, and its rigid enforcement will have the effect to seriously cripple some establishments that deserve to be closed up. It is to be regretted that our laws are not broad enough to close up the many saloons that are the breeding places of crime and that are resorted to by elements that menace the good order of the community. As in all other classes of business, there are grades in saloons. A few do little or no harm as they are conducted, but if it could be the doors of many could be closed, the community would be the better for it. The police department can accomplish much good by placing objectionable places under strict surveillance, and making judicious arrests of suspected hangers-on for vagrancy.

In this State within the past few years there have occurred a number of instances of clandestine and secret marriages by alleged contract. While this contract marriage is authorized by the Codes, it in effect warrants a license for deceit and fraud. In all such cases, it is the woman who suffers in the end. A marriage which has to be concealed is a marriage that ought never to have been. It is scarcely possible to conceive of a rule that is subject to fewer exceptions than this. An elopement is usually as foolish as it is supposed to be romantic, but whether an affair of that kind be regarded as an error or a triumph, a prompt acknowledgment of the contract of marriage generally secures the future of the parties from the results of a concealed marriage. The woman who is persuaded to conceal the fact that she is a wife almost to a certainty has a scoundrel for a husband. It is she who has nothing to gain and everything to lose by secrecy, and her interest in having the truth known constantly increases; whereas if the man is prepared, as he invariably is, to cheat her, time is the most valuable element in his calculations. We have seen too much of this secret marriage business in this State.

There have been some genuine philanthropists—there are some now. It is a strange fact, however, that the vast majority of the wealthy who desire to help their fellow beings by contributions to establish institutions or in founding such as they deem to be desirable, they leave their worthy purpose to be consummated by others after they are dead. In such cases it is a proverbial fact that their designs are rarely carried out, and often fail altogether. It is the experience of these behests that many of the devises have been overthrown by the technical construction of the will. This could all be avoided if our philanthropically inclined would act during life and put their generous purposes into execution. We have one notable instance of this class of philanthropy on this coast, where the donor is making personal execution of his desires.

The announcement of the death of ex-Governor Waterman, at San Diego, on the 12th inst., struck the people with surprise. Mr. Waterman was 64 years of age, but was remarkably robust, and bid fair to live for many years. It would seem there was a fatality connected with the State campaign of 1886. Then it was that on the Republican ticket John F. Swift ran for Governor, and Mr. Waterman for Lieutenant-Governor. Swift died at Yokohama last month. Washington Bartlett, the Democratic nominee, who was elected Governor, died in office. Ex-Congressman P. D. Wiggington, who ran on the American ticket, and Joel Russell, the Prohibition nominee for the Chief Executive office, are dead. The only Gubernatorial nominee of that campaign now living is C. C. O'Donnell, who ran independently. When it is considered that these men figured prominently less than five years ago, it is hard to realize that death has made such ravages. The first American Governor of California—Peter H. Burnett—is still living at San Francisco, and though 83 years of age is actively engaged in business. He was elected November 13, 1849, over Winfield S. Sherwood, John A. Sutter, John W. Geary and W. M. Stewart—all of whom are dead. Burnett resigned his office because of the inadequacy of the salary, and was succeeded by John McDougal, the Lieutenant-Governor, and a brother of Admiral McDougal. McDougal met with the embarrassments that seem to be inevitable to "accidental" Executives, and from his many pardons was dubbed "I, John McDougal." However, his administration was able, and considering the troubles of the times, was creditable. "Honest" John Bigler made two successful runs for Governor—in 1851 and 1853, but was defeated in 1855 by J. Neely Johnson, the Know Nothing nominee. In 1851 Bigler beat Pierson B. Reading, and in 1853 Wm. Waldo. All of the parties so far named, except Burnett, are dead. In 1857 John B. Weller, the Democratic candidate, defeated Edward Stanly, Republican, and George W. Bowie, American. Weller and Stanly are dead. In 1859 Milton S. Latham was elected over John Curry and Leland Stanford. Latham is dead. In 1861 Stanford defeated John R. McConnell and John Conness. McConnell is dead, and Conness, who was afterwards Senator, resides in the East. In 1863 Frederick F. Low was elected over John G. Downey, who had served as Governor on the resignation of Latham. Low and Downey are living. In 1867 occurred the triangular fight between Henry H. Haight, George C. Gorham and Caleb T. Fay. There was the first serious split in the Republican party in State politics, and the first time the Chinese and railroad issues were seriously interjected. Of the contestants Gorham alone survives. In 1871 Newton Booth defeated Haight, and resigning to become United States Senator, Romualdo Pacheco became Governor. In 1875 Wm. Irwin was elected over Timothy G. Phelps and John Bidwell. Irwin is dead. In 1879 George C. Perkins defeated Hugh J. Glenn and William F. White. Glenn was killed by Hiram Miller in Colusa county, and White died several years ago. The candidates who ran in 1882 are all living: George Stoneman, Morris M. Estee, R. H. McDonald and T. J. McQuiddy.

Governor Waterman was much abused. Such errors as he made, however, were due to poor judgment and were not prompted by dishonest motives. That he realized he accepted a position he was not fully capable of filling was very evident; that he acted under bad advice is manifest. However, it is too early to pass judgment upon his official acts, particularly at a time when the administration of his successor affords so striking a contrast. It is sufficient to say Mr. Waterman's death is sincerely regretted, particularly by the citizens of Sacramento, among whom he lived for three years.

Russia has put a severe test to the Turkish government. A warship with "military workmen" has been allowed by the Porte to pass the Dardanelles. The pretext of the Russian government was that the ship was loaded with railroad iron, and came under the commercial character. It is plain to an observer of events that Russia is fortifying herself for a master stroke at some future day. The treaty between the five great Powers and Turkey, made in 1841, provided that no ships of war of any nation other than Turkey should pass the Dardanelles, except with the consent of Turkey. Here then is a direct violation of the treaty on the part of Russia. The war cloud in Europe is getting larger and blacker.

Some of the English papers seem to think that the latitude given to married women under English laws, is conducive to retard the matrimonial relation. Since it has been declared not to be the prerogative of the husband to whip his wife whenever he deemed it necessary to restrain or correct her, and that a wife could not be forced to live with her husband if she did not desire so to do, the matrimonial philanthropists claim that this fact has become a great bar to matrimony. When the old Judges of England used to decide that a husband had a full right to chastise his wife, provided he used a stick no thicker than his little finger, it was urged there was better matrimonial government. Now that this right is denied by the advanced idea of civilization, the Britisher claims that there is not so great a desire to enter the matrimonial state.

During the slavery days one of the favorite themes for political party capital was the miscegenation which would result from the granting the rights of freemen to the colored people of the South. It is now over twenty-five years since the great emancipation edict was pronounced and rendered effectual, and the consequences are different from the speculations indulged, and justies the wisdom of the act, so far as miscegenation is concerned, at least. Travelers who are observant of events, who have spent much time in the old slave States, are general in their belief that the condition of the negro has been improved. The most impressive fact is the general disappearance of the mulattoes. They are still to be found, but in greatly diminished numbers. The mass of the black population are no longer a mixed race.

The white taint which prevailed during the slavery days has nearly disappeared. All in all, the southern negro is gaining in intelligence and industrial skill. It is true that in some localities there is a degree of subjection exercised by the whites which retards the advancement of the negro, but this is much more limited than it was a few years ago.

Our contemporaries are very much exercised that a law has been passed providing for sealers of weights and measures; it has been discovered to be a bad law, since enacted by the Legislature and approved by the Governor. The alarm seems to come that there may be appointed an army of "sealers" who will prey on our retail merchants. We are not disposed to argue the matter, for two reasons: The sealers have not been appointed; and there is no earthly likelihood they will be, save in proper cases. We esteem this as many other laws that have been enacted, and that exist—a dead letter.

AN INTERESTING STRANGER.

Norton's Beach, on the south side of Long Island, and within an hour's railroad ride of New York, is well known as a summer resort of the most exclusive kind.

Year in and year out the same people are to be found at Norton's Beach, and even the Norton House gives shelter to but few strangers.

It was mid-August, 1889, and Florence Maynard—"the belle of the Beach," her many admirers called her—was walking along the sand in company with Hiram Kellogg, the son of a rich brewer, and, if rumor was to be credited, the accepted lover of the young lady.

As the young people strolled on, talking airy nothing, in which Florence did not seem particularly interested, though she complimented her escort by laughing at what he was pleased to think his own wit, a young man of soldierly bearing, well formed and above the average height, passed them without seeming to see them.

"Rather a distinguished-looking man and evidently a newcomer to the Beach," said Florence, when the military-looking stranger had passed out of hearing.

"The fellah has been at the hotel for four or five days," drawled Hiram Kellogg, as he adjusted his single eye-glass and glanced back over his shoulder.

"Has he a name?" asked Florence.

"Yaas—that is, I suppose so. Most people have names, don'tcherknow?" said Hiram Kellogg, with a laugh at what he thought his own humor.

Florence Maynard did not even smile; the pretty lips looked more firm for the instant, as she asked:

"Do you know his name?"

"He has registered 'Clarence Talbot, late Captain in her Majesty's Eleventh Hussars.' But nobody knows him and he does not seem to be communicative. He'll come out though, after a bit, and announce himself as a 'sir,' or a 'lord,' or a 'jook.' That's what all these adventurers do, don'tcherknow?"

A few days after this, Florence began to think that Hiram Kellogg, while not particularly brilliant in other things and a fool in many, was something of a prophet, for the rumor spread through Norton's Beach that there was veritable noblemen at the hotel.

A letter had come for him from Texas, addressed to "Lord Talbot, Captain in Her Majesty's 11th Hussars." The chamber-maid had picked up in his room some torn note-paper with a crest on the head, and she also found a card bearing the same title as that written on the letter.

"Those are the dodges all these fellows adopt," said Hiram Kellogg, when discussing the now great sensation with Mr. and Mrs. Maynard and their lovely daughter. "You may remember, Miss Florence, that I told you the other evening that it would happen just so."

"Yes," replied Florence, "I remember that distinctly. And I also recall the fact that I thought it rather uncharitable to judge a stranger so harshly in advance of some suspicious act. He may be all that the letter and the card would indicate."

"Oh, but he can't be," said Hiram Kellogg in a tone of impatience. "All the fellahs up at the hotel have been talking the matter oval, and we've all agreed to snub him. It's a trick, depend on that."

"I cannot see what the man's purpose could be in planning this matter—as you say he has done," said Mrs. Maynard, quietly.

"Why, there isn't a place of the size in the country," Hiram Kellogg hastened to explain, "that has in it so many rich and pretty girls as Norton Beach."

"Which reminds me," laughed Mr. Maynard, "that we must keep a watch on Florence till this dangerous adventurer takes his departure."

"An entirely useless precaution," said Florence, "as I have already made up my mind to marry no man who is not an American, and who does not think his own country and his own countrymen the best in the world."

Had Hiram Kellogg been thinner skinned, he would have winced under this shot; but as it was, he pretended to be immensely delighted with the beautiful girl's decision.

The next afternoon, Florence—who had decided talent in painting water-colors—went down to the end of a wooden pier or boat landing on the South Bay side of the beach, to make a study of the white-winged yachts skimming over the blue expanse like mighty swans.

She adjusted her tent-like sunshade, set up her little portable easel, and was soon so absorbed in her work that all thought of the interesting stranger and of uninteresting Hiram Kellogg was banished from her mind.

A rising wind and a rising tide forced her to abandon her painting before she had finished what promised to be an excellent piece of work.

She bundled up her easel and shade and was about to turn back, when her hat blew off and caught on the end of a projecting plank.

All unthoughtful of the danger, she walked out, but had gone only a few paces when the plank began to rise.

She gave a cry of alarm, and to save herself let her bundle fall.

On the instant she felt a strong hand on her arm, and strong voice call out:

"Pardon me! I will get your things."

The man's weight on the plank balanced it, and obeying her own instinct and his command, Florence sprang back.

As she did so she saw the interesting stranger falling headlong into the water.

She repeated her cry, and looked at the place where he had vanished.

On the instant Clarence Talbot came to the surface, and spouting the salt water from his mouth, he said, with the hearty laugh of a man engaged in a practical joke:

"Do not be alarmed. There is not the slightest danger, I assure you. And as for the traps, I'll get them for you."

And then, without waiting for any command, he struck out, recovered the bundle and hat, and swimming back, climbed up the pier.

"I—I am sure I cannot find words to thank you, but really you should not have plunged in there," stammered Florence.

"Fools rush in where angels dare not tread," laughed the young man. "And as for the ducking, I assure you I do not mind it. By-the-way, you are not injured, I hope?"

With a heightened color she looked at him, but not daring to trust her voice, she shook her head.

At that instant a fisherman passed, and Clarence Talbot engaged him to take Miss Maynard's dripping hat and bundle to her cottage.

This done, the interesting stranger bowed, smiled and hurried off at a double-quick to the hotel.

The adventure was soon noised abroad, and Hiram Kellogg had the audacity to tell his friends that the whole affair was planned by the designing adventurer.

That evening Mr. Maynard called on Capt. Talbot to thank him for saving his daughter's life. But the young man treated the whole affair like one not at all eager to pose as a hero.

He was invited to the Maynard cottage, and called the next evening. His simple, frank and manly manner, in addition to his fine but unostentatious acquirements, made him a most charming companion, and he left a good impression behind him, and took away with him an invitation to call again, in which Florence, more interested than ever, heartily joined.

Captain Talbot, to the horror and chagrin of Hiram Kellogg, now became a constant visitor at the Maynard cottage, and was received by the best people in the place. Nor did he keep his business a secret. He had left the English army and had come to Norton's Beach to meet a friend and countryman with whom he was going to start a large cattle ranch in Texas.

The friend appeared in good time; but Captain Talbot remained at the Beach till the season was over, and till every one was satisfied that he was the younger son of the Earl of Islington—a fact which he had never pushed forward himself.

Many a pretty girl at Norton's Beach envied Florence Maynard her adventure with the interesting stranger, and Hiram Kellogg, who soon went abroad again, cursed it.

Florence kept her vow as to marrying an American, for to-day the captain, her husband, is a citizen of the great republic, and he has sensibly refused to use himself or have others use, in addressing him, that title of nobility which, in his case, certainly belonged to a nobleman.

Jerry Simpson was once a sailor on the unsalted sea which lashes the shores of Duluth. He was then known as "Barefoot Jerry," but didn't like the name, and really left the fore-castle on account of it. He does not seem to have bettered it greatly by getting into political waters.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

The ballet girl should not include adi-pose in her list of graceful revelations.

Sarah Bernhardt looks to be twenty-five years old. She is really forty-seven, but she acts like sixty.

Phuniman—"Why is the theatrical profession like a strawberry basket?" Knowall—"Because the good ones always get to the top."

Jerome K. Jerome says of the stage sailor: "He does suffer so with his trousers. One of those days an accident will happen to those trousers and then he will be sorry that he didn't get a pair of braces before it was everlastingly too late."

"I have withdrawn from ouah amateur acting club," said Willie Washington. "Why?" "I couldn't stand it any longah, you know. I was cawst for the villain and Miss Pepperton was the heroine, and she was to say, 'Villain, do youah worst.'" "That was easy." "Ya-a-s; but Miss Pepperton wouldn't repeat the words. She said I had already done as badly as any one could reasonably expect."

The New York Dramatic Mirror has the following concerning farce-comedies: We will venture a prediction, in this connection, which one year will serve to fulfil. By next April the farce-comedy will be as dead as a door nail—a thing of the past. The fact that scores of new ventures of this description are preparing to enter the field next season serves to strengthen our conviction, for they will hasten the reaction that is setting in.

The present conditions of the stage are not favorable to the development of great actors. The traveling "combination," even when it has a repertory, cannot be a good school for giving scope and versatility to dramatic talent. They may make "smooth" and "easy" actors, but men and women long accustomed to fitting themselves into certain places and to travel in ruts must inevitably become mechanical, the effect of which in most cases is to destroy ambition for higher and broader effort, and when this is not the case, to make loftier attainment more difficult. There is no inspiration or incentive in acting of this sort, and the actor who has been long confined to it must be greatly gifted if the result does not unfit him for the higher walks of his art.

Every now and then some wild-eyed clergyman or evangelist in the cause of Christianly love for one's self and blue flame for everybody else, comes to the front with a proposition that the theater is the gateway to Hades, and that the men and women of the stage are a lot of ruffians and harlots. Generally, these assaults are based upon no knowledge whatever of the facts. At best they are the product of an exceedingly limited knowledge of the players and their lives. Once in awhile a parson has heard enough of the stage to know there are some men and women connected with it who would disgrace any circle into which they might be thrown. But, even in these rare instances, the accusers proceed on the theory that one swallow makes a summer; that because a few are sinful, all the rest must also be lost and abandoned creatures.—N. Y. Dramatic News.

"McCullough had a valet named Bob Pritchard, who was a curious fellow," said Jos. Haworth, recently. "He was a thrifty Scotchman, and to save money he always made his bed in McCullough's dressing-room in the theater. Once John missed a handsome robe which he wore in Richard III. It couldn't be found. Finally, several months later, when playing in New York, two little Pritchards came to the theater and the dresses which they wore were cut from McCullough's handsome robe."

"Pritchard expressed his sympathy curiously the day the poor guv'nor was buried."

"'He was a great man,' Mr. Haworth," he sobbed, "a good man. Many a dressing-room floor through the country has he wiped with me, sir.'"

Book Chat.

Mrs. Robert Elsmere Humphrey Ward's coming novel is named "David."

A symposium of gifted authors has set forth what the novel of the future is likely to be, but some fellow not in the symposium will most likely have to write it.

An Italian authoress, Mathilde Serrao, is said to have applied much of the power and perception of Dickens to the middle and lower ranks of Italian life, through her novel, "Fantasy."

"The Superfluous Man" is the title of a recently published essay. This is the first time that the man who goes shopping with his wife has figured in serious literature, we believe.

Coleridge says: "Readers may be divided into four classes: 1. Sponges, who absorb all they read, and return it early in the same state, only a little dirty. 2. Sand-glasses, who retain nothing, and are content to get through a book for the sake of getting through the time. 3. Strain bags, who retain merely the dregs of what they read. 4. Mogul diamonds, equally rare and valuable, who profit by what they read, and enable others to profit by it also."

Not long ago Thomas Wentworth Higginson emphasized the Boston twang by rhyming "morning" with "dawning." Now, Dr. J. R. Parke puts the Philadelphia pronunciation on record in the Call by rhyming "talks" with "sock," and his poem is not on Jerry Simpson, either.

From 1550 to 1650, during the lapse of which 100 years the poet was born (1554) and died (1617), there was great freedom taken in spelling the name, as the following table clearly shows:

Shakspeare,	Shackespeare,	Shaxpear,
Shaksper,	Shackespear,	Shaxpeere,
Shakspear,	Shackespere,	Shaxspeer,
Shakspeare,	Shackesper,	Shakxsper,
Shakspeer,	Shackispere,	Shakxper,
Shakspeyre,	Shakisper,	Shakxper,
Shakspeyr,	Shakyspere,	Shakxper,
Shakspear,	Shaxpere,	Shaxepere,
Shacksper,	Shaxspere,	Shaxkespere,
Shackspeare,	Shaxper,	Shagspere,
Shackspire,	Shaxsper,	Shaxeper,
Shakespere,	Saxpere,	Shaxkesper,
Shakesper,	Saxspere,	Sackesper,
Shakespere,	Saxsper,	Shakxper,
Shakespeer,	Shaxpeare,	Shakuspeare.

In the deed under which Shakspeare purchased for the sum of £440 the unexpired term in the titles of Stratford, Old Stratford, Bishopton, and Welcomb, Shakespeare is found once, Shakespear once; once there is a simple initial, and in the remaining ten cases the name appears with the second h, viz: Shackesphere, three; Shakesphere, five times; Shacksphare, once, and Shakesphere, once. In the registers of Smithfield, 1596-7, record is made of the burial of "Margaret Saxpere, widow, being times the wyff of Henry Shakspere." Here are variations enough from which to choose a spelling for the name, but it may as well be added that the best authorities have fixed as a standard upon Shakspeare.

Professional Chat.

At the present rate of legal fees none but a wealthy man can "keep his own counsel."

"I liked your sermon so much to-day," said the old lady to the clergyman. "Indeed?" said he, evidently pleased. "Yes," she went on, "it reminded me so much of one I read when I was a girl."

It is said that Senator Peffer calls a certain necessary article of men's apparel "galluses." But that is not the question; does he wear them? If he does he is no true reformer, and may as well surrender the track to Simpson.

A Chinese medical practitioner has been discoursing in a Shanghai native paper on the treatment of cholera. Among other medicants he is wont to prescribe "pig's liver mixed with brick dust from the inside of a furnace." This is said to "soothe the extraordinary derangement of the system," and perhaps it does.

One of Hartford's prominent ministers was pacing a hotel corridor not long ago, when a colporteur approached him with this question: "Are you a Christian?" "I hope so," replied the clergyman, modestly. "Hope so! Don't you know so?" persisted his interlocuter. No response from the minister. "Well, now," said the stranger, "if a man should strike you on the right cheek, would you turn him the other, also?" "No, I wouldn't, if he had as much cheek as you have." The interview was not prolonged.

An old pastor in Connecticut, a prudent, spiritual and faithful man, was damaged by a report from a neighboring community that he had brought politics into his preaching. A friend visited the place where the minister was reported to have done so, and asked a brother in the church, "Did Dr. Ely preach politics when here?" "Yes," was the response, "he did." "What did he say?" "Well, sir," said the interrogated witness more dubiously, "if he didn't preach politics, he anyhow prayed politics." "But what did he say?" still urged his friend. "Say!" echoed the respondent, "he said, 'Though hand join in hand the wicked shall not go unpunished.'"

A sick man sent for the nearest spiritual adviser. It so happened that the minister was a new fledgling just emerging from the seminary. He was dudish in the extreme. His coat was cut in true clerical style, and his face bore the expression of affected literary culture. Going to the poor man's house, he sat on the edge of a chair, toying with his hat and stroking his downy mustache. Said he to the dying man, after a long spell of silence painful to all: "What induced you to send for me?" "You will have to speak louder," faintly replied the sufferer; "I'm dull of hearing." "What induced you to send for me?" reiterated the clergyman. "No use, can't hear. What does he say, Mary?" turning to his wife. And then in a loud, shrill and stentorian voice the woman replied: "He says what in the deuce did you send for him for."

Some years ago a lively and amusing controversy arose in an English court of justice. The question was as to the meaning of the word team, as used by writers generally and in a particular document. Quotations from poets, citations from dictionary-makers, and chatty remarks on what the poets and lexicographers really meant, diversified the otherwise dull proceedings of John Doe and Richard Roe. It was fun for the lawyers, for the public, for everybody save the litigants. Here are the facts of the case. A certain noble duke made an agreement with one of his tenants in Oxfordshire concerning the occupancy of a farm. One portion of the agreement ran in this way: "The tenant to perform each year for the Duke of —, at the rate of one day's team work, with two horses and one proper person, for every £50 of rent, when required (except at hay or corn harvest), without being paid for the same." In other words, rent was to be paid in two ways. The larger was to be a money payment; the lesser, a certain amount of farm service. Everything went smoothly until one day when the duke's agent summoned the farmer to send a cart to fetch coals from the railway station to the ducal residence. "No such thing!" said the farmer; "I'll send the horses and a man, but you must find the cart." "Pooh, my good man; what do you mean? Does not your agreement bind you to do team-work occasionally for his grace?" "Well, here's the team; two horses, and a careful man to drive them." "But the horses and cart together form a team." "Oh, no! The horses are the team." And so they went at it tooth and nail, hammer and tongs.

Genius and Personality in Writing.

The tendency shown by some thinkers and writers in recent days to exclude all supernatural or even mysterious elements from the problem of life manifests itself in an occasional doubt of the existence of that subtle quality of soul which we call genius. For it is to be noted that genius is a quality of soul, and not a mind only; that it involves something more than clear perception and keen mental action. There is something in it which makes its possessor master of the secrets and hearts of his fellows; a deep and beautiful sympathy, at the approach of which all doors are unlocked and all barriers thrown down. By no possibility could Shakespeare have known by observation all that he wrote about life and character; a large part of it he divined. He himself could have given no account of it. And this is true of all great works of art; there is something mysterious and inexplicable about them. In the nature of every great artist there is something incommunicable and hidden; something which eludes all search and analysis. The definition which has behind it the authority of an indefatigable observer, that genius is only very great labor, falls to the ground the moment it is brought face to face with a great work of art. Between genius and labor, however strenuous and noble, there is a great gulf fixed; genius wings its highest flights by the aid of labor, but labor of itself has no power of flight. A work of talent, of skill, can be analyzed and resolved into its parts; a work of genius is an indivisible whole which betrays no signs of mechanical adaptation and adjustment. There is in every great work of literature a quality which comes from the personality of the writer, and which is, for that reason, inexplicable. What we call genius is the highest manifestation of personality, the complete and beautiful expression of that which is distinctive and characteristic of the man. Upon personality we can no more lay our hand than on any other vital principle. We see its manifestations clearly enough, but we never see it. Personality is evidently one of the primary things in this world, and is, therefore, unremovable; it is vital, and therefore not to be traced or detected or comprehended. Wherever we touch vitality—the principle of life—we touch a mystery which baffles the deepest science and hides its secret from the keenest scrutiny; and in a human soul this mystery confronts us. There is something in us that cometh not by observation; something sacred and inaccessible; and the expression of this sacred and inaccessible thing is what we call genius. It is written that no man can see God and live, and there is something divine in us upon which we are not suffered to look; a holy of holies from which the veil is never lifted. It is through this mysterious quality of personality that great truths come, and by it they are expressed. In every age there are powerful and controlling ideas which appear in many minds and in many works without agreement or even intimation from one to another; for there is something behind life which is being revealed through it, and this revelation is made to and through great natures. In this sense it is strictly true that great men are inspired; that is, breathed into by something not themselves. Call that something what we may, it is clear that it exists and communicates with men through those who, by reason of depth, range, and sensitiveness of nature, comprehend and express it. No labor can establish that subtle, inexplicable intercourse with the truth and beauty which invisibly surround us; we can only say that it exists and that it is an affair of soul.—Hamilton Wright Mabie.

When Great Britain and the United States go to fighting about seals, no doubt the fur will fly.

Premier Rudini appears to be in need of some level-headed person to help him keep his shirt on.

The farmer who undertakes to earn his bread by the sweat of a hired man's brow had better make up his mind to do without pie.

People who always tell their dreams to other people in the morning never seem to get over their surprise because the other people are not as much interested in them as they are themselves.

"As blind as a mole" must henceforth take its place in the waste heap of shattered similes. A German naturalist has demonstrated that moles have eyes, and that they can see as well as other animals.

From latest accounts Secretary Blaine has grown weary of the perverse behavior of Italy's representatives. It is not probable that Mr. Blaine will submit to much from Rudini or the Italian cabinet.

A German doctor declares that he finds by exhaustive experiments that exercise has no influence upon digestion. But the distressing fact remains that the average man must exercise in order to obtain something to digest.

All Hohenzollern princes are baptized with water from the Jordan. A great porcelain jug of this water is kept in the shop of the castle apothecary, and after every baptism the water left in the font is carefully returned to this receptacle.

It appears from recent occurrences that the King of Italy has just heard of the discovery of America; as a matter of fact we are about to celebrate the 400th anniversary of that event. It is time European monarchs understood its significance.

"What office are you a candidate for?" inquired the reporter, who was making his hasty rounds of the polling-places. "Me?" exclaimed the man leaning up against the door frame. "Thunder! I ain't running for anything. I was born in this country."

Now comes a scientist who disputes the established theory in relation to the moon, and claims that the lights and shadows of the moon are inconsistent with the theory that it is spherical in shape. All astronomers heretofore maintain the spherical shape of all the heavenly bodies.

Bismark has undoubtedly been elected a member of the German Reichstag. This will be a direct blow at the government under William. The German people are devoted to Bismark and do not take kindly to the Emperor's treatment of the old chief. Bismark always claimed great friendship for America and American institutions.

A needle after a devious experience of thirty-six years in the body of a Missouri woman made its exit through her side. It is said that the needle lost its temper and is very pliable. We doubt not that the Missouri woman lost her temper many times during the thirty-six years, yet, being a Missourian, she still has an abundance of temper left.

"Do you know why so many people go deaf as they grow older?" said a doctor. "It is because they sleep with their mouths open. Any man or woman who does this persistently for years will finally grow deaf. But that is not the only disadvantage of so sleeping. It is the cause of a score of affections of the throat and lungs, not to speak of snoring."

Let as much sunlight as possible into your rooms; it is the deadly enemy of disease-breeding germs. A learned doctor's experiments prove that hardy bacilli were killed by thirty-five days' exposure to an autumnal sun, while microbes of the same sort survived for three years in the dark. Therefore, even at the risk of taking the color out of your carpets, let in the light and air.

Do you believe that every good act is rewarded here on earth and that every bad act brings its own punishment during life? If we think every time a man gives a dollar in charity the Lord will send him one dollar and fifty cents, and that every time a man is guilty of injustice to his fellow-being he will break his leg—if this is what we think, we are sadly in need of religious instruction.

We like the expression of our Southern brethren who are receiving President Harrison so royally. There is something like a true brotherly feeling in the South at the receptions of the President. The Governor of Alabama was particularly happy in his warm welcome. When the President complimented the militia of Alabama, and remarked that he could safely rely on the State soldiers in case of need, Governor Jones promptly said: "In case of need, you will find all Alabama at your back, sir." We trust the visit of the President to the South will serve to harmonize any discordant spirit that may yet remain in the South, and bring us nearer together as one people than we have been for many years. The sentiments expressed on this journey seem to indicate this result.

Of all the tributes to the memory of the late Gov. Waterman, that paid by the Atta was the sincerest and best. Coming from a Democratic journal that in his life had had occasion to deal the unfortunate Governor some trenchant blows, the obituary on his death was not alone magnanimous but above all else said on the subject drew nearer to the eloquent in conception and composition.

Complaint has been made that a street contractor in San Francisco used mud instead of concrete to pave a street. We do not see why the newspapers should make a fuss about this little matter at this time. Give the Board of Supervisors an opportunity to give the contractor the usual coating of whitewash, and then let the criticism come, if there will then be opportunity for criticism.

Secretary Blaine's reply to the Italian minister is a masterly effort—dignified, firm and unmistakable in its purport. The reference to Daniel Webster's treatment of the great diplomatic question, which arose during President Fillmore's administration, regarding the Spanish riots, and the application of the principles to the present situation are grand. The Italian minister is floundering in his errors.

We saw a regular, old-fashioned ten-mule prairie schooner a few days ago preparing for duty in the interior where the iron horse has not yet arrived. The prairie schooner retains the romantic and picturesque elements which have always appealed strongly to the fancy of the poet, the novelist and painter. It is the emblem of the old pioneer, and the pioneer always has been and always will be a hero in the popular imagination.

General Ben Butler has run counter to a Federal Judge, and was practically disbarred from that Court because of remarks made out of Court ridiculing the rulings of the Judge. From the intemperate utterances that are so characteristic of the General, it can readily be believed his observations were calculated to arouse the judicial resentment, yet it is rarely that a Judge notices that which is said concerning him out of Court.

Premier Rudini has seized a picturesque opportunity for calling a halt in Italian emigration to this country, and, if he can get along without a Minister at Washington, we can. If he should wish Minister Porter to be recalled from Rome, we can recall him without any loss of national dignity or prosperity, and quietly wait thirty or forty years if used be for the petulant Italians to get over their madness, and invite a reinstitution of diplomatic relations.

The man who deserts in the army is held to be a traitor and is shot. The man who deserts the ballot—the substitute for the bayonet—should be punished by civil law as a criminal. The crime committed is precisely the same in degree as that of the deserter. And when one remembers that nearly all the abuses with which our political system is blamed are directly attributable to the men who ought to vote and don't, he appreciates the force of the comparison.

Boer courtships are carried on in this wise: The swain rides up to the house of his chosen fair, dressed in his best toggery, and well mounted; and, having obtained permission from her parents, when the family retires to rest—often in the same apartment—sets up (op-sits) with his innamorata. So long as the candle with which he is furnished burns, so long may he his tale of love unfold. When it burns out they must part and retire also. The process is called op-sitting.

From the carefully prepared census bulletin of March 26, relating to the production of granite as a building commodity, we find that California, considering the amount of capital invested, produces more cubic feet of prepared granite than any other State in the Union. Massachusetts and Maine apparently lead in this line, but fall to the second and fourth places when California comes to the front. Our granite industry is not fully appreciated by the people of this State; indeed few realize how important a factor this is in our commercial relations.

Ambrose Bierce is the brightest, yet most pitiless satirist on this coast. With all his astuteness he has been sadly hoaxed by one of Charley McClatchey's satires on our local "generals" and "majors." The latter drew upon his imagination and called a war meeting of the "generals" and "majors," whereat blood-curdling, warlike speeches were reported to have been made. In the Examiner's "Prattle" Bierce quotes an extract of one of these speeches, and seriously comments on the same, assuming, of course, that it is genuine. We said last week that the greatest scientist is the most credulous being on earth. Now we must add that the brightest satirist has shown a disposition to become a victim of satire.

The threatened attack on the validity of the recent election, whereby an additional tax was voted to pay the just claims of our police force, is entirely without merit. Even though technically there may have been some defects in the manner of preparing the tickets, or designating the nature of the special tax, it is certain that every elector understood perfectly what he was voting for. Should the tax levy be declared void, it would only result in an expensive election at some future day, and this would entail this additional expense upon the taxpayers. Wherefore, what benefit could arise by setting aside the present levy?

Students of penology will be interested in the new French penal law. Under a new law which has just been promulgated, certain first offenders in France are hereafter to be afforded ample opportunity to repent, reform and save themselves from becoming habitual offenders, permanent members of the dangerous class. The French criminal courts are empowered by this law to postpone sentences for five years when those who have earned them are shown to be new to crime. If at the end of five years these monuments of mercy appear to have profited by it, to have committed no other offense, the original sentence becomes void. This form of conditioned clemency commends itself to those who hold that the main object of punishment is reformation.

The Emperor William is writing a history of his grandfather, in two volumes, assisted by his tutor, Professor Hinzpeter. If the tumor behind his majesty's ear is playing any such pranks with his intellectuals as our Berlin correspondent says it is, a history of the professor's experiences as assistant historian would prove a much more interesting work. Already among Bismark's friends the belief is current that the dismissal of the iron chancellor was the act of a crazy man. It would be a sorry ending of so promising a career if it should turn out that the enterprise and originality which the young emperor has exhibited were the result of an abnormal condition of the brain. He seems at this distance to possess many of the elements of a great monarch, and all friends of Germany will cling to the hope that there is nothing in the tumor theory.

President Harrison is well received by the people on his trip, and it is peculiarly gratifying that the people of the South manifest a disposition to outdo their Northern brethren in doing honor to the executive head. It is a striking contrast to President Johnson's famous "swing around the circle." Mr. Johnson was, however, unfortunate in that the people of the North were not generally in accord with his reconstruction policy. It was too soon after the war for bitterness to die out, yet time has demonstrated that the President's policy of reconciliation was about correct, and was perhaps that which would have been pursued by President Lincoln had he lived. The humorous letters of Petroleum V. Nasby, descriptive of Mr. Johnson's trip, form a unique contribution to political literature. Then, again, the pencil of Nast did much to surround the trip with an atmosphere of ridicule.

A committee, selected by the citizens' executive committee on the reception of President Harrison, has gone to San Francisco to confer with the citizens' committee of that city to arrange for a reception in this city and fix the time and extent of the visit of the President here. A telegram from the President's Private Secretary indicates that the time allotted to San Francisco and vicinity is to be so apportioned that Sacramento shall have a brief visit by the Presidential party. The conference committee consists of Hon. W. D. Comstock (mayor), Hon. Newton Booth, General W. H. H. Hart, Judge W. C. Van Fleet, Hon. John W. Armstrong, Prof. E. C. Atkinson, General T. W. Sheehan, J. O. Coleman, Major W. A. Anderson, Wells Drury. This committee is to report to the general executive committee at a meeting to be held at the court-room, Monday, at 1:30. There will be a general citizens' meeting at the court-room on Monday evening, to consummate a plan of action.

The spectacle of an English Judge shedding tears on the bench on announcing his resignation from his high station is enough to make Jeffries, Norberry and all the other ancient bloody judges of that cruel kingdom turn in their coffins and groan with chagrin that one of their successors should be so womanly as to be able to assume the lachrymose wood. It can only be conjectured as a cause of Judge Stevens' weeping that his reason must be wavering, else a great error was perpetrated in his selection to the judiciary. If the history of that country has ever recorded the existence of a humane judge then the page on which the fact is written has been sealed to the ordinary reader. The martyred Emmet told the blood-stained Norberry who condemned him to death that if all the innocent blood that he (Norberry) had shed was gathered in one reservoir, his lordship might swim in it. So, too, with all of the other English bloodhounds of that judiciary; if all the innocent blood they have tearlessly ordered to be judicially shed was housed in one lake the navies of the world might ride at anchor in it. And yet one of them, on resigning, at the present day can drop a tear! Can it be that the poor man has had a horrid nightmare after reading the lives of the Lord Chief Justices, during which the cruel deeds of the past rose in horrid panorama before his startled gaze, and on awakening realized the fact that the avenging Nemesis had stricken terror to his soul, and that a softening brain forced him to surrender the gown and wig ere the madhouse doors closed about him forever?

From the census bulletin issued March 26, upon Mines and Mining—Granite, we gather the following relating to the careful investigation of "Granite for Street Work," which is interesting for Sacramento at this time: Experience has demonstrated that the best and most enduring streets for heavy traffic in large cities are those paved with stone blocks of proper material and size laid upon a specially prepared bed. The very hard and tough rocks frequently used, though capable of withstanding a maximum amount of wear, soon become smooth and glazed under traffic, and are therefore inferior to a stone which, wearing roughly, affords a better foothold for horses. Many of the granite rocks possess the right degree of hardness and brittleness, and are largely used for this purpose. Streets paved with the large sized block used at first were found to be more difficult to keep in repair, worse for horses, and rougher on vehicles than pavements made of the smaller blocks now in general use. There is no uniform standard of size, as specifications of the various cities call for different sizes, but the variations are not great, and blocks $3\frac{1}{2}$ to $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, 6 to 7 inches deep, and 8 to 12 inches long are generally preferred. In New York city, Brooklyn, and Philadelphia, blocks a trifle longer are more commonly used, while in many of the western and southern cities the length does not exceed 10 inches. New Orleans, owing to the peculiar nature of its streets, takes blocks much larger.

It is said some enterprising genius, anxious to contribute his share to the success of California's exhibit at the World's Columbian Exhibition, is now collecting and arranging in proper shape all the telegrams coming from Chicago in which Director De Young's name appears, with a view to find just how often it occurs in each dispatch. Up to the present time he has quite an exhibit of that august cognomen, and it makes a most sensational and startling show as it bristles alternately with every other word in those dispatches. By the time the exhibition is dedicated in the spring of 1892, the compiler expects to have the first volume in octavo size and by the end of the time for which the great show is to last, the fall of 1893, he will have the name often enough for a second volume. The dedication ceremonies only will occur in 1892, but the formal opening will not be till the following spring, so that the historic name will not be repeated more than often enough up to the opening exercises to justify the hope of compiling one volume, but as affairs connected with the Exposition will be rushing and exciting, it is fondly anticipated that there will be no bother in easily collecting the name into a second book. When completed the work will be known as "D'Uganna," or "The Nameless Name." As a companion curiosity to the foregoing, the same gentleman is already far advanced on another booklet which he calls "What I Looked For and Never Found." It is nothing less than a compilation of the data relating to the offices that M. M. Estee has looked for during the last few years—Federal or State. The gentleman doing this patriotic work is in correspondence with the various departments at Washington, and with private citizens of this State, so that he may not make the mistake of omitting any, as he has only the reports of the papers to guide him and they may not contain notices of all the places to which the self-sacrificing patriot has aspired. When the Chicago World's Fair is over, both works spoken of will be used as corner stones of the national monument that it is proposed to erect in Washington to the memory of our famous finder, Christopher Columbus.

An unfortunate man has obtained access to rich Baron Rapiueau. He depicts his misfortune, his misery in so moving a manner that the baron, with tears in his eyes and his voice choked with sobs, calls to his servant: "Jean! Put this poor fellow out into the street! He is breaking my heart."

"The human race must be awfully fast," said St. Peter. "Why do you think so?" queried Gabriel. "They are all out of breath when they get here," returned the gate-keeper.

The Knights.

The past week has been an eventful one in the history of the Order of Knights of Pythias in California. The Grand Lodge convened in Castle Hall, corner Ninth and I streets, in this city, at half past 7 o'clock on Monday evening. Mayor Comstock, in a few well-chosen words, welcomed the visitors to the hearts and homes of the people of the Capital City, and the Grand Chancellor responded in his usual happy vein in behalf of the members of the Grand Lodge. This body has been in session every day of the past week since its assemblage on Monday evening, and has transacted a large amount of business that will result in the material improvement of the organization throughout the State. A number of important legal questions have been solved, and there can be no doubt that the delegates and visitors will return to their homes with a better understanding of the principles and aims of the Order with which they are identified. Various measures have been proposed and debated in an able manner, and the discussions will prove of great benefit to all whose privilege it has been to take part in the proceedings.

The social features of the gathering are particularly worthy of mention. On Tuesday evening the Pythian Sisters gave an entertainment to which the Knights were invited. An enjoyable time was had by all who participated. The ball on Wednesday evening, under the direction of the Uniform Rank, was a most successful affair. The hall of the Assembly Chamber was filled with Knights and their ladies fair, who indulged in the pleasures of the dance until a late hour. But the crowning social event of the past week, was the banquet held in the Assembly Chamber on Thursday evening. The local committee, of which Charles J. Fredericks is Chairman, had made arrangements for seating 400, and although the bad state of the weather doubtless tended to some extent to reduce the attendance, there were several hundred members of the Grand Lodge, Past Chancellors and Knights present. A bountiful repast had been prepared to meet the wants of the inner man. Major H. Weinstock filled the position of master of ceremonies with distinguished ability. Past Grand Chancellor Katzenstein made an appropriate address of welcome, after which the first regular toast "Our Guests," was responded to by Junior Past Grand Chancellor Crowley. Supreme Representative Blackmer handled "Our Supreme Lodge" in an able manner, and delegate Schuler, of Chico, emphasized the importance of "Subordinate Lodges." "The Uniform Rank" was next toasted by Brigadier General Schaffner, and "Pythian Laws" found an able exponent in S. L. Carter, of Stockton. Other toasts were offered, and the exercises were not concluded until a late hour. Sacramento people have done all in their power to make the stay of their visitors pleasant, and we have reason to believe that the past week will ever remain a bright spot in the memories of hundreds of Pythian Knights.

He—"I am inclined to think that it is a girl, and not a man, in the moon." She—"And why?" "Because there is often a ring around it."

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The Bostonians, in Robin Hood, drew a splendid house on Tuesday night. It is a pleasure to witness and hear such an excellent company. It has the rare combination of musical and dramatic ability. The effect of a well-trained orchestra was also a marked feature of the performance. Certainly the Bostonians have no cause for complaint against Sacramento for lack of patronage or enthusiasm.

Some of the theater ushers who congregate on the back seats during the performance, would contribute to the comfort and enjoyment of the auditors who are compelled to sit near them, by refraining from loud talking and uncalled for comments on other persons in the audience. During the performance of the Bostonians, the confusion on the back seats was great. Let this be a warning for the future.

Hoyt's Texas Steer filled the Clunie Opera House to its capacity last night. This particular creation of Mr. Hoyt is something different from his other popular sketches. The characters of this play are real living beings whom we all at once recognize. The company is remarkably strong and under the direct supervision of Mr. Hoyt. It is not necessary to dwell upon the play, as it is now as familiar as household words. A Texas Steer to-night.

The ever popular McNeill Club will give H. M. S. Pinafore on next Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, at the Metropolitan Theater. This is one of the most celebrated light operas ever written, and has the faculty of never becoming tiresome. There will be no professionals in the cast. The cast will be: "Josephine," Miss Irma Fitch; "Buttercup," Miss Hannah Shields; "Hebe," Miss May Cassidy; "Ralph Rackstraw," Richard Cohn; "Captain," Harry Blair; "Admiral," W. E. Lovdal; "Dick Deadeye," Horace Crocker; "Boatswain," C. M. Phinney; "Boatswain's Mate," H. Phillips. The chorus will be larger than heretofore, but it will be a difficult matter to make it better or stronger. The club chorus is excellent and would do credit to first-class opera. There is little doubt of full houses during the production of Pinafore. Albert Hart is the general stage manager, than whom no better lives. W. H. Kinross is musical director. Box office at C. S. Houghton's.

The First of Its Species.

The following is the first claim ever audited against the State of California. We present it as a curiosity.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA
To I. S. BRADFORD, DR.

For services as Member of Assembly from District of Sonoma from the 15 day of Dec. 1849 to the 14 day of Feb. 1850 both inclusive—62 days at 16¢ pr day ----- $992.00

I [torn] that the above account is correct.

JOHN BIGLER,
Speaker House of Assembly.

I certify that the above account is just and true and has been audited by the Comptroller Feb 20 1850. I. S. BRADFORD.

No. 1. STATE TO HON. I. S. BRADFORD, Member of Assembly from Sonoma District. Act. $1152.00, from Dec 15 1849 to Feb 14 1850 both inclusive.

It is curious to note what vulgarisms creep into the American language, even the language spoken by well educated, not to say cultured people. Just at present the ear is harrowed by a phrase, or rather a word, much used by our belles who assist afternoon hostesses at that function called a "tea." "My dear," says one girl to another, "I'm invited to pour for Mrs. Commonwealth next Wednesday." "Oh, are you? Well, she asked me to turn, but I had another engagement." Heavens and earth, I thought, what is the meaning of "pour and 'turn'?" It was some time before the verbs and their implied noun made a connection in my brain, and then the desire to stand these young women in a corner was so intense I retired to avoid a demonstration. The century has indeed grown old and lazy where the tongue finds so small a word as "tea" difficult of utterance. To pour tea is about as simple a phrase as can be spoken, and to drop the final word tea is to render it intolerably vulgar. The custom at large afternoon receptions here of having two good-looking girls perform this service, generally imposed on servants in well-appointed houses in London, is thoroughly American, and so, too, is the abominable fault which has grown out of it.

"What! you say that Mr. Smith, the merchant, has gone blind! Here's a pretty how d'ye do. I've got a bill on the man which is made out 'payable at sight!'"

Michael Angelo's "David."

When Michael Angelo was a little over 25 years of age it appears that there was an immense block of marble in the yard of the workshops of the Florence cathedral, which had lain there for years. Several sculptors had talked of making something from it and Michael Angelo was asked by the consuls to make something good of it. He abandoned an undertaking of another kind and contracted to make a statue in two years. He was to be paid six gold florins a month and as much more as would be agreed upon when the work was done. He first made a model in wax of his "David." It was very small and is now in the Uffizi. In the beginning of 1504, after about two and one-half years had been spent upon it, the work was done and a discussion then arose as to where it should be placed. It was decided to put it where Michael Angelo himself wished it to be, next the gate of the palace, where the "Judith" of Donatello then stood. The statue weighed 18,000 pounds and its removal was a work of great importance. Grimm says: "The erection of this David was like an occurrence in nature, from which people are accustomed to reckon. We find events dated so many years after the erection of the giant. It was mentioned in records in which there was not a line respecting art." In 1527 the statue was injured by a stone thrown in a riot. At length it began to show the effects of time and weather and the people of Florence talked of removing it for better preservation. There was much feeling against this; the Florentines feared that misfortune would fall upon them if this great work were disturbed, but at last, in 1873, it was placed in the academy of fine arts. It represents the youthful David at the moment when he declares to Goliath, "I come unto thee in the name of the Lord of Hosts." The beautiful figure is muscular and pliant, and the face is full of courage.

The Name "Long Island."

Owing to its shape the Dutch gave what we now call Long Island, the name Lange Eylant. During Governor Fletcher's administration the act of general assembly of New York, 1693, the name of Nassau was decreed (a Dutch compliment to Prince Maurice of Nassau). It was not favorably received by the settlers, and by common consent they used Long Island. The act of 1693 has never been repealed. The Indian names for the island were Metekock (periwinkle), they using the small shell of which they made wampum. They also used the names Paumacke, Matanwacke, Mertowax and Seawanhacke, this latter Seawanor, Seawant, the coin manufactured by the aborigines from the shell of the quahaug (clam), the land being the great mine of the nation, the island of shells.

Mayor Mathews, of Boston, says that in fifty years the majority of the people of New England will be of Irish and French descent. The remark is perhaps a little chestnutty, but is interesting, nevertheless. The Boston Transcript thinks, however, that the original Yankee will always maintain their ascendancy in New England. It says: "The fact that they are of the same religious communion will tend in time to fuse the Irish, French and Italian inhabitants of New England into one compact class, while the separate faith of the Yankees will help to keep their blood pure. If Mayor Mathews is right, Savage's Genealogical Dictionary, with its faithful account of all the people who came before 1692, will yet be the 'Domesday' book of an American aristocracy. Where is the calamity about being elevated into a sort of Norman upper class?" All of which is frank, even if a little egotistical.

Cheerfulness can become a habit, and habits sometimes help us over hard places. A cheerful heart seeth cheerful things. A lady and gentleman were in a lumber yard situated by a dirty, foul-smelling river. The lady said: "How good the pine boards smell!" "Pine boards!" exclaimed the gentleman. "Just smell this foul river!" "No, thank you," the lady replied, "I prefer to smell the pine boards." And she was right. If she or we can carry this principle through our entire living, we shall have the cheerful heart, the cheerful voice and cheerful face. There is in some houses an unconscious atmosphere of domestic and social ozone which brightens everybody. Wealth cannot give it, nor can poverty take it away.

An Extensive Salt Mine.

The most extensive and celebrated salt mine in the world is at Wieliczka, nine miles from Cracow, in Galicia, a province of Austria-Hungary. It has been worked continuously for 600 years. The mass of salt is calculated to be 500 miles long, 20 miles broad and 1,200 feet thick. It is on the northwest side of a ridge of hills, an offset of the Carpathians. The mine is divided into four levels, and is 284 yards deep and 1 mile 1,279 yards long by 830 yards wide. It is stated that the collective length of the galleries and chambers is not less than 30 English miles, and the total yield 55,000 tons annually. The lower levels contain streets and houses and constitute a complete village. Travelers have given glowing descriptions of the crystal vaults, sparkling aisles and fairy like chambers of this mine. One is called the chapel of St. Anthony and has an altar, crucifix of saints large as life, all of pure salt? Another apartment is called Francis Joseph's ballroom and has been used for dancing. It is lighted by six large chandeliers which resemble cut glass, but are in reality of pure crystalline rock salt. Statues of Vulcan and Neptune, sculptured from salt, also adorn the ballroom, which, when well illuminated, exhibits a marvellous splendor.

First Oil Well in America.

For many years previous to 1853 oil had been observed floating on the surface of the water in a well near Titusville, Pa. Some persons were at the trouble to gather some of it, and it was used for medicinal purposes. It was thought to be merely temporary, but it continued and pressed its presence upon the attention of certain persons who presumed they saw some possibilities of a commercial character in it. In the year 1853 Dr. Brewer suggested its use for lighting and lubricating, and in 1854 the first of the oil companies was formed, but the ensuing panic began to develop, and amid the dull times the operations of the concern did not experience immediate prosperity. However, Messrs. Drake and Bowditch concluded that they would sink a well, and they were at once satisfied by seeing from 400 to 1,000 gallons of oil a day being the product. In 1861 the first large flowing well was struck, and the oil came up so abundantly as to flow over the surface, yielding from 800 to 1,000 barrels daily.

Many persons who extend their mental work well into the night or during the evening, follow attentively the programme of a theater or concert, are awakened in the morning or in the night with a headache. A Swiss doctor points out that this headache affects many persons who are quite well otherwise, and is due in part to the previous excessive work of the brain, whereby an abnormal flow of blood to that organ is caused; in part to other causes, for example, too great heat of rooms, contamination of the air with carbonic acid, exhalations from human bodies and tobacco smoke. For a long time the doctor was a sufferer from headache of this kind, but of late years has wholly protected himself by simple means. When he is obliged to continue his brain work into the evening or to remain late in rooms not well ventilated, instead of going directly to bed he takes a brisk walk for half an hour or an hour. While taking this exercise he stops now and then and practices lung gymnastics by breathing in and out deeply a few times. When he then goes to bed he sleeps soundly. Notwithstanding the shortness of the hours of sleep he awakens with no trace of headache.

"If housekeepers would take a hint from hotels," says a hotel man, "they would have less trouble with servants. Hotel men have no trouble in getting all the help they want, though they offer only moderate wages. The difference is not so much in the work as in the hours. In a private house the girl's labors are from the rising of the sun, even unto the going down of the same, and more, too. And if she does happen to get through her work and ventures to sit down, her mistress is apt to object. In a hotel a girl has certain well-defined duties to perform and after they are performed, as a rule, her time is her own. If some such arrangement could be recognized in private houses the servant problem would be much simplified."

The steamship Great Eastern was the largest steamship built, being 692 feet long on deck, 680 feet from stem to sternpost, 83 feet broad and 58 feet deep. The City of Paris is 580 feet over all, 63 1/4 feet extreme breadth and 59 1/4 feet from upper deck cabins to keel. The Teutonic and Majestic are 582 feet long, 57 1/2 feet broad and 39 1/3 feet deep. The Teutonic and Majestic are therefore the largest steamships afloat.

At a dance a bright young man and a just bright enough young woman stood up to begin the military schottische. "How shall we dance this, as the servants do or like the gentry?" he asked facetiously. "Whichever way you are accustomed to," replied his partner. "They did not 'drop arms.'"

The Lady of the East.

Who art thou, Lady of the East,
Whose day of eyes and night of hair
The daughter of a king, at least,
Proclaim, so brightly, darkly fair?
Thy life is a perpetual feast,
With but a single shadow there.

What is it, Lady? Some sweet thing
Which once was thine, but now is fled?
Thy lute has lost its golden string?
Thy rose its freshest odor shed?
The bird thou lovest has taken wing,
And to another sings instead?

What is it, Princess, that hath cast
This sudden sadness on thy brow?
The shadow of what loving past?
The memory of what broken vow?
Girlhood hath gone from thee at last,
And thou art perfect woman now.

I see thee as thou standest there
With those mysterious eyes of thine,
And all that midnight length of hair,
Like Dis' pall on Proserpine;
I only know that thou art fair,
I only wish that thou wert mine.

What earth's first women were thou art,
Glorious and gracious to behold,
With greater steadfastness of heart,
Though cast in less heroic mold,
And yet with tears that sooner start,
And smiles that were not known of old.

Thou hast no need to wear a crown,
So royal in thyself art thou;
And whether fortune smile or frown,
Thou hath the same unruffled brow;
Content if only men bow down
And worship thee—as I do now.

I love thee, and will be to thee
All that all men have been, and more;
Love me, and thou shalt be to me
What never woman was before:
Be thou the shore, and I the sea,
And let the great Sea kiss the shore.

—Richard Henry Stoddard.

Floral Offerings in Theaters.

"I never have stayed a night in Philadelphia before," said a Broadway florist, "and I don't know why I did last week, except to oblige a friend in my own business, whom I had gone over to see. He was anxious to keep me and take me to the theater. He was particularly anxious about the theater. We went to a variety show—not my choice—a little girl did a skirt dance, and a big basket of flowers was handed up to her, and right then my friend jumped up and was ready to go. I was ready, too, and my friend, Githerns is his name, proposed the Walnut-street Theater next. He said there was a good melodrama on at the Walnut, with a strong scene in the first act. I didn't care; anything was better than skirt dancing.

"At the Walnut-street Theater I just had time to get interested in the hero, a young Swede, who seemed to be tearing up Minnesota by the roots, for which they handed him a basket of roses over the footlights, when Githerns was up again. I wanted to stay, but he was so particular about my having a look at Crane in 'The Senator,' at the Chestnut-street Opera House, that I picked up my hat. By the way, I began to notice that Githerns was pretty solid at the doors.

"Know that little girl who acts Kitty for Crane? She has a love scene in the second act, and she got a basket of flowers for it. Somehow that basket of flowers looked familiar to me. I wasn't altogether unprepared to see Githerns quietly reach for his overcoat as soon as he had seen the roses safely passed in behind the flies, and step out into the aisle, motioning for me to follow. When we got outside he said: 'Come out strong, didn't it? Good effect—good effect.'

"Said I: 'Githerns, have you got a monopoly here? It looks to me that way.'
"I supply the best theaters in Philadelphia," said he. "Not another man in this city can give a theater basket the professional touch that I can, and they know it. That's why I get the trade."

"The Chestnut-street Theater was next on our list, and after that came the Park, which we reached at the end of the second act—the flowers were on for the recall. Then we enjoyed the mad delight of a dash in a Philadelphia omnibus for the Broad-street Theater. Githerns enjoyed it, anyhow, and kept telling me the third act of 'Cleopatra,' with Fanny Davenport in the title role, offered the florist a better opportunity for a climax than any other production ever known on the American stage. 'You'll see,' he said. 'You watch for yourself and decide whether the public doesn't appreciate the situation.'

"He was a happy man when Fanny raised herself on her dying elbow to guide her American beauties tenderly across the footlights. I'll be hanged if I don't think he was crying. Anyway, when we got to the Bellevue for supper, he said: 'That Anthony was a danged fool, according to my ideas.'

"Much difference it makes to you," said I. "You're all right. Marc Anthony might go on water gruel diet in the violent ward for all I cared if I had your contract. I must have seen half a dozen of these big baskets of yours handed in to-night; and you and I know what the profit is."

"Half a dozen?" said he, looking puzzled. "Why, did you think—?"
"A light seemed to hit me in the black of the eye. 'Githerns,' said I, 'is it possible that the one basket of flowers supplies all the theaters in Philadelphia?'"
"Certainly," said he; "you see for yourself how easy it is—in spite of our distances."
"I tell you, Philadelphia is a funny place."

Gambrinus.

According to one fable, Gambrinus was a poor fiddler who sold his soul to the devil on the promise of unlimited wealth. Satan taught him to make chiming bells and lager beer. The emperor of Rome, on the first trial of the beverage, made its inventor duke of Brabant and count of Flanders. According to contract, Gambrinus was to enjoy his great wealth for thirty years. At the end of that time Satan sent a messenger for him, but he made the messenger drunk and so escaped and lived on comfortably for a couple of centuries more. The Gambrinus of German folk lore flourished at some remote period and was the first to brew beer. A tradition of medieval times made him one of the very ancient German kings—the seventh in descent from Noah—who flourished about 1730 B. C. Gambrinus, as inventor of beer, also figures in the legends of Denmark. Jean Primus (John the First), duke of Brabant, who was born in 1251 and died in 1294, was a generous patron of the arts, and was made an honorary member of the guild of brewers in Brussels. In their place of meeting they had his portrait suspended, showing him in his official robes, bearing a tankard of beer in his hand. In course of time the memory of the liberal duke perished, and late generations regard his portrait to represent a mythical inventor of beer, and the name Gambrinus is probably a corruption of the name of the duke, Jean Primus.

All men are asses, true enough:
We run from small to smaller.
Some strut and try the rest to bluff—
The shorter hate the taller.

The rich, with contumelious mien,
Are fawned on by the ladies,
While we poor devils turn pea-green,
And wish the knaves in hades.

The greatest man that ever lived
And mauled o'er his toddy,
Was no whit better when he died
Than if he'd been—nobody.

MARTHA PHILLIPS.

She was dead. Old woman with silvery hair, a sad, quiet face; a patient mouth with lines that told of sorrow borne with gentle firmness; and two withered, tired hands crossed. That was all.

Fifty years she had lived under that roof, a farmer's wife. On her coffin you will see "Aged 70," and she was only 20 when John Phillips brought her home a bride. A half century she had kept her careful watch over her dairy and larder, had made butter and cheese and looked after the innumerable duties that fall to the share of a farmer's wife. But underneath her quiet exterior there was a story that John never dreamed of. She did not marry for love. When she was 19, a rosy, happy girl, a stranger came on a visit to their village and that summer was the brightest she ever knew. Paul Gardner was the stranger's name; he was an artist and fell in love with the simple village girl and won her heart; and when he went away in the autumn they were betrothed.

"I come again in the spring," he said. "Trust me and wait for me, Mattie, dear."

She promised to love and wait for him till the end of time if need be, and with a kiss on her quivering lips he went away.

Springtime came, and true to his word Paul returned; he staid only a day or two this time.

"I am going away in a few weeks to Italy to study," he said.

He put a tiny ring upon her finger, cut a little curly tress from her brown hair, and telling her always to be true, he went away. The months went by, and Mattie was trying to make the time seem short by studying to improve herself so that she might be worthy of her lover when he should come back to make her his wife. One day she glanced over a newspaper; her eyes were attracted by his name, and with white lips and dilated eyes, she read of his marriage to another.

An hour afterward as she sat in the twilight, she heard a step on the gravel walk and looking up saw John Phillips coming up the steps. He had been to see her often before but had never yet spoken of love, and received no encouragement to do so. Now he seemed to have come for the express purpose of asking her to be his wife; he took a chair beside her and after the usual greeting, reserving scarcely a moment to take breath in, began in his business-like way. There was no confession of love, no pleading, no hand-clasping, no tender glances; he simply wanted her; would she be his wife? Her lips moved to tell him she did not love him; but as she let fall her eyes from the crimson-hearted rose that swung from the vine over the window she caught sight of those few lines again. The decision was made. Her cheeks were ashy pale as she looked up into his eyes and answered, quietly: "Yes, I will be your wife." Her parents were pleased that she was chosen by so well-to-do a young man; so it was settled and they were married during the summer. People thought that she sobered down wonderfully; more than that, nothing was said that would lead any one to suppose that any change had taken place.

Two years went by. A baby slept in the cradle, and Martha—no one called her Mattie but Paul—sat rocking with her foot as she knitted a blue woolen stocking for the baby's father. There was a knock at the half-open door.

"Will you be kind enough to direct me the nearest way to the village?" said a voice, and a stranger stepped in. She rose to give him the required direction when he came quickly forward.

"Paul!"

"Mattie!"

His face lighted up and he reached out his arms. With a surprised, painful look, she drew back. "Mr. Gardner, this is a most unexpected meeting."

"Mr. Gardner!" he repeated; "Mattie, what do you mean?"

"Don't call me Mattie, if you please," she replied, with dignity. "My name is Phillips."

"Phillips!" he echoed. "Are you married?"

"These are strange words from you, Paul Gardner; did you think I was waiting all this time for another woman's husband—that I was keeping my faith with one who played false so soon?"

"Played you false! I am come as I promised you. The two years are but just passed and I am here to claim you. Why do you greet me thus? Are you indeed married, Mattie Gray?" She was trembling like an aspen leaf. For an answer she pointed to the cradle. He came and stood before her with white face and folded arms. "Tell me why you did this! Didn't you love me well enough to wait for me?"

She went and unlocked a drawer and took out a newspaper. Unfolding it and finding the place, she pointed to it with her finger and he read the marriage notice. "What of this?" he asked, as he met her reproachful look. "Oh, Mattie, you thought it was me. It is my cousin. I am not married nor in love with anyone but you."

"Are you telling the truth?" she asked, in an eager, husky whisper. And then, as he replied "It is true," she gave a low groan and sank down into a chair.

"Oh, Paul, forgive me! I didn't know you had a cousin by the same name. I ought not to have doubted you, but 'twas there in black and white—and this man, my husband, came, and I married him." With bitter tears, she told how all happened. With clenched hands he walked to and fro, then stopped beside the cradle and bent over the sleeping child. Then he turned, and kneeling before her, said in a low voice: "I forgive you, Mattie; be as happy as you can." He took both her hands in his and looked steadily, lovingly into her face. His lips twitched convulsively. "I have no right here—you are another man's wife. Good-bye. God bless you."

Seventy years old! Her stalwart sons and bright-eyed daughters remember her as a loving, devoted mother, her gray-haired husband as a most faithful wife.

"Never was woman more patient and kind, and as good a housewife as ever was," he said, as he brushed the back of his old brown hand across his eyes while looking down on the peaceful face.

And not one of them ever knew of the weary heart and broken hope that had died in her breast, nor even dreamed of the sad load she had borne through life.

In a town up North an ex-judge is cashier of a bank. One day recently he refused to cash a check offered by a stranger.

"The check is all right," he said, "but the evidence you offer in identifying yourself as the person to whose order it is drawn is scarcely sufficient."

"I've known you to hang a man on less evidence, judge," was the stranger's response.

"Quite likely," replied the ex-judge, "but when it comes to letting go of cold cash we have to be careful."—Globe-Democrat.

JEWELS AND LACES.

"Oh, girl with the jewelled fingers,
Oh, girl with the laces rare!"

What are your jewels and what are your laces worth to you if, from undergoing the trying ordeals which fashionable society imposes on its devotees, enough to test the physical strength and endurance of the most robust, you break down, lose your health and become a physical wreck, as thousands do from such causes?

Under such circumstances you would willingly give all your jewels and all your laces to regain lost health. This you can do if you will but resort to the use of that great restorative known as Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. Thousands of grateful women bless the day it was made known to them.

For all derangements, irregularities and weaknesses peculiar to women, it is the only remedy, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper, and faithfully carried out for many years.

An invigorating tonic, it imparts strength to the whole system. For feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the greatest earthly boon.

Dr. Pierce's Pellets regulate and cleanse the liver, stomach and bowels. One a dose. Sold by druggists. 25 cents a vial.

A CURE FOR LOVE.

Take 12 ounces of Dislike, 1 pound of Resolution, 2 grains of Common Sense, 2 ounces of Experience, a large sprig of time, and 3 quarts of cooling water of Consideration.

Set these over the gentle fire of Love, sweeten with the spoon of Forgetfulness, skim it with the spoon of Melancholy, put in the bottom of your heart, cork it with the cork of a clear Conscience, let it remain and you will quickly find ease and be restored to your senses again.

These things can be had of the Apothecary at the home of Understanding next door to Reason, on Prudent Street, in the village of Contentment.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California.—In the matter of William Enright, an insolvent debtor.—William Enright having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said William Enright is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said William Enright, insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent to him, or to any person, firm, corporation or association for his use; and the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court-room of said Court, in the County of Sacramento, on the 8th day of May 1891, at 1:30 o'clock, P. M. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered, that the order be published in the Times, a newspaper of general circulation, published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published, before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And it is further ordered, that, in the meantime, all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated April 6th, 1891. W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO.—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to Helen A. Grant, Allen D. Grant, Edward N. Grant, Catherine Matzen, Mary M. Miller, John Doe, and Richard Roe, greeting.

You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the county of Sacramento, State of California, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 25th day of January, 1891, in which action EDWARD DIETERLE is plaintiff and you are defendants.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: The said action is brought for the purpose of quieting the title to that certain piece or parcel of land situated, lying and being in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, and State of California, and described according to the plan of said city, as the south twenty (20) feet of the west sixty-eight (68) feet of lot number one, in the block bounded by J and K, and 5th and 6th streets; for the purpose, also, of determining all adverse claims of the said defendants to said property; and for a decree of said Court, declaring and adjudging that the title of plaintiff to said premises is good and valid, and that neither the said defendants have, nor any of them has, any estate or interest in the same; and forever enjoining and debarring the said defendants, and each of them, from asserting any claim to said land adverse to plaintiff, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made.

And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court this 20th day of February, A. D. 1891.

Ich Bin Dein.

The Journal of Education commends this ingenious poem, written in five languages—English, French, German, Greek and Latin—as one of the best specimens of Macaronic verse in existence, and worthy of preservation by all collectors:

In tempus old a hero lived,
Qui loved puellas deus;
He no pouvait pas quite to say
Which one amabat mieux.

Dit-il lui meme un beau matin,
"Non po sumt both avoir,
Sed si address Amanda Ann,
Then Kate and I have war.

Auanda habet argent coin,
Sed Kate has aureas curls;
Et both sunt very agathae
Et quite formosae girls."

Enfin the youthful anthropos,
Philoun the duo maids,
Resolved proponere ad Kate
Devant eet evening's shades.

Proceedens then to Kate's domo,
Il trouve Amanda there,
Kai quite forgot his late resolves,
Both sunt so goodly fair.

Sed smiling on the new tapis,
Between puellas twain,
Coeptit to tell his love a Kate
Dans un poetique strain.

Mais, glancing ever et anon
At fair Amanda's eyes,
Illae non possunt dicere
Pro which he meant his sighs.

Each virgo heard the demi-vow,
With cheeks as rouge as wine,
And off ring each a milk-white hand,
Both whispered, "Ich bin dein."

Reasons for the Secret Jackets Worn by the British Regiments.

When in 1851 the Duke of Wellington asked Lord Stanhope, then war minister, as to when the English army first wore red, he was told that the custom dated from the time of Charles II. The duke thought it was earlier, and Lord Macaulay said he was right and that the commonwealth army wore red. It will be of interest, perhaps, to see when this color was first adopted by the British army.

As early as the campaign in Spain in 1367, in support of Peter the Cruel, and also in the following reign of Richard II, the English soldier appears to have been in white with a red cross of St. George on his breast and back. In 1461 there is evidence of red being adopted for a small number of men at least, when a contingent for the army of the King-Maker (the Earl of Warwick) was sent from Rye dressed in red coats. In 1740 a detachment of fifteen men sent from Canterbury for the Calais garrison, and others for London, were supplied with red "jackettis" of cloth at three shillings a yard, and having on them "roses of white karsay" as badges.

Henry VII in 1485 instituted the yeomen of the guard, and they were the nucleus of the present standing army of England. Their dress, as it still continues, was red. In Elizabeth's reign the army wore a variety of colors, but a change occurred in 1584, when some of the troops for Ireland wore coats of motley and others of "sadd greene or russet." The cavalry at this time wore red cloaks and breeches, and infantry who went to the low countries wore red coats. An incident at the siege of Rouen, in 1591, showed that red was looked upon as the English color; for in mentioning the death of one of the earls of Essex's captains, it is remarked that the Frenchman who shot him got near enough to do so by putting on the red coat of a dead English soldier. In 1643 the king's life guards, as also the queen's and Prince Rupert's, wore red coats. Monk's regiment (now Coldstream guards) was the first to wear red coats with green facings in 1650.

At the restoration red became the national color of the British army, and except in the case of the Irish brigade, the Swiss guards and perhaps a few other instances, red has been the distinguishing color of the English forces.

In Thessaly and Macedonia it is customary in times of prolonged drought to send a procession of children around to all the wells and springs in their neighborhood. At their head walks a girl adorned with flowers, whom they drench with water at each halting-place while singing this invocation:

Perperia, all fresh bedewed,
Freshen all this neighborhood;
By the woods, on the highway,
As thou goest to God now pray:
O, my God, upon the plain,
Send Thon us a still, small rain;
That the fields may fruitful be,
That vines in blossoms we may see.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

The way to a man's heart is through the medium of a good dinner. Diplomatic wives solved that problem many years ago. When she wishes to accomplish some object otherwise unattainable, her recourse is a little home dinner, which never fails to bring forth the desired results. A New York World editor is evidently educated upon the subject of good dinners, and is a man after our own heart. He is an advocate of the little home dinner. The "little home dinner" is of the genuine æsthetic character, and is the center of home life, the event of the day when the household is gathered together to enjoy it. A friend or two added to the family circle gives zest to the meal as well as the conversation, which in turn aids digestion as the spice in the food. Our "little home dinner" must not be a sham of dishes and plate. The dishes should be few in number, savory, well cooked and daintily served, selected in accordance with the appetites and desires of the household, and placed upon the table. This notion of serving which attains to "big dinners" is not in accord with our idea of the home dinner. We want no carving done on some side table in the kitchen. We want to do our own carving at the table and the heads of most families of the old school pride themselves on their dextrous carving. This thing of serving by courses, as they are called, is out of place at the home dinner. There must be no rush or hurry at the home dinner, even though the main dinner is all on the table at once. When we sit down to such a dinner there are no unfortunate waits, or speculations as to what will come next. The elegant and daintily cooked viands are before us to whet the appetite. Indeed, such a dinner has no suggestions of an end. We eat and enjoy it. When the main dinner is disposed of, our dessert and coffee come seasoned with conversation. Nor does the "little home dinner" end with this. Cigars and an opportunity for general talk, with liberty to move about without quitting the table. Is there an intellectual man in the country who would not prefer such a dinner to the grand parade of unpronounceable dishes that come by sections at the so-called great dinner? At a large gathering of people, the regulation banquet process is perhaps necessary. At such dinners we may enjoy the wit and wine after a fashion, but for real wholesome enjoyment of dinner, we prefer, infinitely prefer, our "little home dinner." We may be a little egotistic, perhaps old fashioned, but the "little home dinner" that our wife can cook and serve does the business for us.

President Harrison's trip through the South and West must have proved a source of genuine gratification to that gentleman, as he has everywhere been received in a manner becoming American citizenship. The receptions tendered him have all been marked with dignity and a strong desire upon the part of the people to show the great love and admiration entertained by them for the exalted position occupied by Mr. Harrison. During the President's sojourn on this coast we do not at all deem it presumptuous to remind him that it is not in the larger cities he will find the pure and fervid love of patriotism which abounds in the towns and villages of our country. And since the President has come among us, we believe it to be his duty to shorten his stay in San Francisco and pay a visit—no matter how brief—to every town in California. In the "city by the sea," it would seem as if the strict rules of "society" were to govern the President in all his movements. The Government of the United States was not founded upon, nor is it to be perpetuated by the wealth and dress of her people. The millions of freemen who have woven her laurels of fame, and who have and are making her history have not done the work with hands encased in kid, nor backs covered with the regulation claw-hammer.

During his stay with us, President Harrison has it in his power, and it is his duty, to visit the workshops and factories of every town in California. He is no greater in the discharge of his official duties than is the skilled artisan at his work-bench. The same goal is to be reached by both—success in the object sought to be accomplished. San Francisco can offer more social inducements, perhaps, but it will most certainly be exclusive in character. The "400" can don their kids and claw-hammers and entertain the President with ball and rout, with sail and drive, with receptions and teas, with banquets and visits, in a manner to consume about all the time which should be given to the people; and all this while the crowds of freemen come together in the jostle and crush on the sidewalks and "hip, hip, hurrah!" as the procession moves along. We do not wish to be understood as insinuating that President Harrison will be governed by these rules of "society", as we have too high a regard for him as a man and as a citizen, and we believe that he will endeavor to leave a pleasing recollection of his visit to the coast in the minds of all whom he may meet, and, upon his departure, carry with him the good-will of our whole people.

Political parties and prominent public men have received peculiar designations, in some instances designed for ridicule, and in others for exaltation. In the colonial days there were two parties, Whig and Tory. The term Whig is from Whiggam-more, a corruption of Ugham-more (pack-saddle thieves), from the Celtic ugham (a pack saddle). The Scotch freebooters were called pack-saddle thieves, from the pack saddles which they used to employ for the stowage of plunder. The Marquis of Argyle collected a band of these vagabonds and instigated them to aid him in opposing certain governmental measures in the reign of James I, and in the reign of Charles II, all who opposed government were called "Argyle Whiggamors," contracted into Whigs. Precisely how the name attached to an American political party it is difficult to understand, but it was unquestionably an importation from England. The Whig party maintained its existence in the United States until 1852, and General Scott was its last Presidential nominee. In the colonial days the Whigs favored immediate and absolute separation of the American colonies from Great Britain, while the Tories advocated an adherence to the Crown. The word Tory, says Defoe, is the Irish toruigh, used in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, to signify a band of Irish robbers. It is formed from the verb toruighim (to make sudden raids). Golius says: "Whatever inhabits mountains and forests is a Tory." Lord Macauley says: "The name was first given to those who refused to concur in excluding James from the throne." He further says: "The bogs of Ireland afforded a refuge to popish outlaws, called Tories." Tory hunting was a pastime, which has even found place in our nursery rhymes—"I went to the wood and I killed a Tory." Crossley gives as a derivation, Taobh-righ (Celtic), "King's party." Notes and Queries gives it as Tuath-righ, "Partizans of the King." Other authorities give Tar-a-ri, "Come, O King;" and Toree! the highwayman's demand "Give!" (your money or your life).

In 1787, the Federal party sprang into existence. It was an offshoot of the Whig party, and its primary object was to secure the adoption of the Constitution. The party was opposed by the Particularist Whigs and anti-Federal parties, who opposed the general Constitution and declared in favor of local self government in the States. The Federal party went out of existence in 1816, when Rufus King was supported by it for President. In 1793, the anti-Federalists consolidated, and were at first disposed to call their organization the Democratic-Republicans, but finally called it the Republican party, to avoid the opposite of the extreme which they had charged against the Federalists. Each party had its taunts to use, the Federalists being denounced as monarchists, and their opponents as democrats; the one presumed to be looking forward to monarchy, and the other to the rule of the mob. Jefferson was the real founder of this Republican party; it practically was the inception of the present Democratic organization. The party elected Presidents Jefferson, Madison and Monroe, and Jackson for the first term, but in 1828 the latter was elected as a Democrat over John Quincy Adams, National Republican. Practically, however, in 1805 the name "Republican" was dropped and that of "Democrat" accepted in its stead.

The first attempt to establish a Native American party was in the city of New York, in 1835. It ended in a failure to elect a Mayor in 1837. It was revived in April, 1844, and the city election was carried by a large majority. The movement then spread to New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and was desperately opposed by the Democrats. In Philadelphia the feeling ran so high that riots resulted, and two Catholic churches were burned. The party disappeared in 1845. In 1853 the American party was organized. It was popularly known as the "Know Nothing" party, and was a secret organization. The nickname arose from the fact that the members replied to every question concerning their society, "I know nothing about it." They carried California in 1855, but the following year their only Presidential candidate, Fillmore, was badly beaten. Division on the slavery question destroyed the organization, yet of late years a party with similar principles, though not secret, has developed considerable strength. The present Republican party was formed in 1856, and has preserved the name since, except for a time it was known as the "Union" party. In addition, there have figured in national politics the anti-Masonic, Liberty, Free Soil, Free Democratic, Constitutional Union, Liberal Republican, Prohibition and Greenback parties.

The Democratic party has enjoyed many nicknames. Thurlow Weed, in his autobiography, gives the following account of the term "Barn-burner," formerly applied to one wing of that party:

Without undertaking to positively guarantee the correctness of my memory on that point, I give you the facts as I now recall them in regard to its derivation. About the year 1842 a popular movement in Rhode Island, for a change of the State Constitution, finally took the shape of an insurrection, named, from its leader, "the Dorr Rebellion." Among the acts incident to that time of public disorder, were highway robberies and the burning of farmers' well-stored barns. These acts the "law and order party" charged upon their radical opponents, whom they stigmatized as "robbers," "rioters," "incendiaries" and "barn-burners." A few years later, when discords arose in the Democratic party in the State of New York, in regard to canal policy and other subjects, the radical wing advocated a change of the Constitution. They bestowed upon the conservative portion of the party the nickname of "Old Hunkers," implying their stubborn resistance to reforms. [Much, perhaps, as we now apply the nickname "Mossback," or "Silurian,"—Eds.] The latter retorted by saying the so called constitutional reformers were "barn-burners," like their Rhode Island prototypes. It added point to the charge that some of the "barn-burner" presses and politicians were remembered as having encouraged the "Dorr rebellion." But Colonel Samuel Young, who presided at one of the first State Conventions held by the radical faction, accepted the title. "Gentlemen," said he, "they call us Barn-burners. Thunder and lightning are barn burners sometimes; but they greatly purify the whole atmosphere, and that, gentlemen, is what we propose to do." During the agitation of the slavery question, which followed, the "Old Hunkers" maintained a conservative attitude, while the more radical "Barn burners" became the nucleus of the Free Soil party of 1848.

The "Albany Regency" was a nickname given by Thurlow Weed to a junto of Democratic politicians who had their headquarters at Albany, New York, and who controlled the Democratic party for many years. Their weight in national politics was very great. Their effort to elect William H. Crawford, President, over John Quincy Adams, was their first great struggle. "Loco Focos" was the name applied in 1834, to the extreme portion of the Democratic party, because at a meeting in Tammany Hall, New York, in which there was great diversity of sentiment, the chairman left his seat, and the lights were extinguished, with a view to dissolve the meeting; when those in favor of extreme measures produced "loco foco" matches, rekindled the lights, continued the meeting and accomplished their object.

St. Tammany was the name of an Indian chief, who in the United States has been popularly canonized as a saint, and adopted as the tutelary genius of one branch of the Democratic party. Tammany, or Tammennund (the name is variously written), was of the Delaware nation, and lived probably in the middle of the seventeenth century. He resided in the country which is now Delaware until he was of age, when he moved beyond the Alleghenies, and settled on the banks of the Ohio. He became a chief sachem of his tribe, and being always a friend of the whites, often restrained his warriors from deeds of violence. His rule was always discreet, and he endeavored to induce his followers to cultivate agriculture and the arts of peace, rather than those of war. When he became old, he called a council to have a successor appointed, after which the residue of his life was spent in retirement; and tradition relates that "young and old repaired to his wigwam to hear him discourse wisdom." His great motto was "Unite in peace for happiness, in war for defense." When and by whom he was first styled "saint," or by what whim he was chosen to be the patron of the Democracy, does not appear.—W. L. Stone.

The term "Copperhead" was applied to the northern Democrats during the civil war. It was derived from the name of a poisonous snake that gives no warning of its attack, and presumptively intimated that the party to whom it was applied was covertly in sympathy with the people of the South. The Republicans have been derisively characterized as the "Black Republicans," "Abolitionists," and "Radicals."

In California there have been unique names to political organizations. In 1865 a split occurred in the Republican party, and the factions were known as the "Long Hairs" and the "Short Hairs." The term originated in the course of a debate in the Assembly upon a bill to redistrict San Francisco into wards, and to apportion the Supervisor districts. It was charged upon those who claimed to be the particular friends of Senator Conness that they were endeavoring to "gerrymander" the city so that the control of its affairs might be thrown into the hands of the "roughs" and "short-hair boys." The term seemed so expressive that it was adopted, and the more straight laced element were dubbed the "Long Hairs." The New Constitution party of 1879 was ridiculed as the "Honorable Bilks" and the "Plug Hat Brigade," by Kearney. The Independent party of 1873 received the name of "Dolly Varden," after a character of Dickens. The prevailing fashion in women's dress that year was of material of large and variegated flowers which was called "Dolly Varden." From the fact that the new party included many different elements from a political party standpoint, it was at once called "Dolly Varden."

With regard to men, few of political or military prominence have escaped a nickname. Washington was known as the "Father of His Country." That was a title given by the Roman Senate and Forum to Cicero, on account of the zeal, courage and prudence he displayed in unmasking the famous Catilinarian conspiracy, and bringing the leaders to punishment.

This title was offered to Marius, but he refused it. It was subsequently bestowed upon several of the Cæsars, and was borne by Cosmo de Medici, and some other European princes. The same appellation has been popularly conferred upon President Washington, of whom Jefferson said: "His was the singular destiny and merit of leading the armies of his country successfully through an arduous war for the establishment of its independence, and of conducting its councils through the birth of a government, new in its forms and principles, until it had settled down into a quiet and orderly train." President Jackson was nicknamed "Old Hickory." It was conferred upon him in 1813 by the soldiers under his command. Parton, the historian, says:

The name of "Old Hickory" was not an instantaneous inspiration, but a growth. First of all, the remark was made by some soldier, who was struck with his commander's pedestrian powers, that the General was "tough." Next it was observed of him that he was "tough as hickory." Then he was called "Hickory." Lastly, the affectionate adjective "old" was prefixed, and the General thenceforth rejoiced in the compound nickname, usually the first-won honor of a great commander.

According to another account, the name sprung from his having on one occasion set his men an example of endurance by feeding on hickory nuts, when destitute of supplies. Martin Van Buren was entitled the "Little Magician" in allusion to his political sagacity and talents. Of him it was said he allowed others to shake the bush and he captured the bird in matters political. "Old Man Eloquent" was an expression applied to John Quincy Adams, the sixth President. The term was first used by Milton in his tenth sonnet, in allusion to Isocrates:

When that dishonest victory
At Charonea, fatal to liberty,
Killed with report that Old Man Eloquent.

"Tippecanoe" was a title conferred on General William H. Harrison during the political canvas of 1840, on account of the victory gained by him over the Indians in the battle which took place November 6, 1811, at the junction of the Tippecanoe and Wabash rivers. "Old Public Functionary" was a sobriquet applied to President Buchanan. He first applied the expression to himself in his annual message to Congress in 1859. At times it was humorously abbreviated O. P. F. Abraham Lincoln was nicknamed "Honest Old Abe." To him was also applied the cant appellation "The Rail Splitter." He had supported himself for one winter in early life by splitting rails for a farmer. James A. Garfield had the appellation the "Canal Boy" from the circumstance that when a youth he drove a team for a canal boat. Allen G. Thurman is the "Old Roman"; Samuel J. Tilden, "The Sage of Grammercy Park"; John A. Logan, "Black Jack"; President Taylor, "Old Rough and Ready"; James G. Blaine, "The Plumed Knight"; Samuel S. Cox, "Sunset"; General McClellan, "Little Mac," and President Cleveland, "Innocuous Desuetude." "The Wagoner Boy" was a popular name for Thomas Corwin. While yet a lad, Harrison and his army were on the northern frontier, almost destitute of provisions, and a demand was made on the patriotism of the people to furnish the necessary subsistence. The elder Corwin loaded a wagon with supplies, which was delivered by his son, who remained with the army during the rest of the campaign, and who is said to have proved himself "a good whip and an excellent reinsman." Stephen A. Douglas was known by the popular sobriquet "Little Giant," an allusion to the disparity between his physical and his intellectual development. "The Mill Boy of the Slashes" was a name conferred on Henry Clay, who was born in the neighborhood of a place in Hanover county, Virginia, known as the Slashes (a local term for a low, swampy country), where there was a mill, to which he was often sent on errands when a boy.

In California Governor McDougal was nicknamed "I, John"; Senator Conness, "Our Only Sober Senator," from the fact that his colleague, James A. McDougall, was inclined to be convivial. Senator Gwin was called the "Duke," that he accepted that title from the Maximilian government of Mexico. Senator Hearst was plain "Uncle George." Governor Bigler was named by his admirers "Honest John." General Fremont was called the "Pathfinder," from the fact that he headed parties of exploration across the continent.

A Most Clever Satire.

The English writer, Andrew Lang, has written the following imaginary critique of Homer, based upon our modern style of review. It is a splendid satire on criticism by newspapers:

It would be undesirable to say in what part of the ruins of Naupactus, in Egypt, the papyrus was found which contains a whole file of the Theatês, a Chian weekly journal of the ninth century B. C. Internal evidence—for example, the use of a Greek alphabet of only sixteen letters—sufficiently proves that this is by far the oldest of all Greek manuscripts. The papyrus indicates the existence of high culture in Chios, and is doubly valuable as the only contemporary review of Homer which has reached us. We offer a translation, which is, of course, subject to the criticism of experts, and even of persons wholly unacquainted with the topic and with the Greek language. Here follows the review.

THE ODYSSEY.

Not content with that monstrous offspring of modern sensationalism, the Iliad, Mr. Homer now offers to the public a kind of continuation, which he calls the Odyssey. We need scarcely repeat our objections to the Iliad, a work which may have been, and we regret to say has been, widely sold among the unthinking, but which persons of culture can only regret. While Mr. Homer confined himself to describing the battles of frogs and mice, or to satire on that excellent critic Mr. Margites, we were content to smile. But when he took to writing about the wars of gods and heroes, we felt bound to remonstrate.

The Iliad was an ill-assorted series of chapters. It had scarcely a plot, and Mr. Homer, after killing a respectable prince, actually brought him back as chief mourner at the funeral of his lamented son! Mr. Homer appears to have constituted himself the laureate of blood and brutality. His hero, Achilles, is a sulky and cruel savage, who, after going out "on strike" for a mere personal grievance, afterwards kills many of his captives in cold blood, and maltreats the body of a gallant enemy. Mr. Homer's pages positively reek with gore. He is not content with killing off his characters in batches; he must tell us the very spot in their frames—often in a most indelicate manner—where the spear strikes them, while the spear-shaft throbs with the beating of the heart! This ferocious taste is justly repugnant to a ninth-century (B. C.) audience. Mr. Homer, that he might lack no fault, also dabbles wildly in the supernatural. We do not censure only his extraordinary lack of reverence. Our readers must have shuddered at the audacity which could make the Queen of Heaven a vulgar scold, and Zeus himself a henpecked husband. We refer rather to the wild inventions of talking horses, gods who assume the shape of vultures, deadly wounds which are miraculously healed at a moment's notice, and so forth, childish figments which, in this so-called ninth century B. C., may well excite astonishment and disdain.

We hoped that, in his Iliad, Mr. Homer had touched the very nadir of the absurdity possible even to a popular romancer. But, in his Odyssey, he actually outdoes himself. We gladly admit that Mr. Homer in bruises himself less in blood than has been his wont. Except for a skirmish or two with Ciconians and other queer people, a brutal affair with a fabulous monster, and an altercation with a pieuvre (for such we take "Scylla of the Rock" to be) Mr. Homer, for him, is content with very little bloodshed. But, as he reaches the close of his third volume, Mr. Homer warns to his work. His hero, Odysseus, with the assistance only of a pork-butcher, his own son, a cowherd, and (of course) a goddess, kills no fewer than one hundred and seventeen men in his own dining-room! Not content with this perfectly impossible and revolting massacre, Mr. Homer adds scenes of cold-blooded and heartless cruelty. He hangs a large number of young house-maids for no reason at all except that they had, as in duty bound, attended to the guests of their mistress. Worse yet, will it be credited that Mr. Homer describes, in language which we can only reprobate, and dare not quote, a brutal fistic encounter with a pauper in receipt of outdoor relief, and the slow and obscene tortures inflicted by the hero and his friends on an unfortunate member of the laboring classes! This may please our Upper Ten, but we warn Mr. Homer that the peaceful and industrious Demos may be provoked past endurance. Mr. Homer has at no time shown any concern for the interests of the working classes, who, oddly enough, are among his most fanatical admirers, as the records of the Chian Free Library too sadly attest.

But we must justify our remarks by a sketch of Mr. Homer's latest and most monstrous production. The story begins when Odysseus, in the tenth year of his wanderings from Troy, has been living for eight years in a cave with a remarkable personage, an immortal woman, named Calypso. This "immortal" business, we frankly warn Mr. Homer, has been overdone. But how did Odysseus get dans cette galère? This we learn from a long-winded tissue of improbabilities, with which he later gulls Alcinous I, the respected ancestor of the present Corcyrean monarch. On leaving Troy, the hero of Mr. Homer, with his usual wanton brutality, had attacked, and, we rejoice to say, had been beaten by, a Thracian tribe. Thence the wind drove him Heaven knows where, into one of Mr. Homer's favorite African regions, the land of the Lotus Eaters. For some unexplained reason he killed none of his hosts, but sailed on, still in the vague, till, by a ludicrous invention, he reached a country of one-eyed pastoral characters, somewhat above the middle height, the Cyclopes. Here he killed the sheep, shot the game, and generally made himself at home in a cave (Mr. Homer is fond of caves) till the shepherd came back, and, absurd to state, began eating the comrades of Odysseus. For a man who lived on milk, this conduct was hardly consistent. By a piece of behavior, too common, alas! where our boasted civilization comes in contact with early races, Odysseus made the Cyclope drunk; wine, of course, being unknown to his unsophisticated race. He then took a base and brutal advantage of his opportunity, bored the shepherd's eye out with a red hot piece of timber, and fled. He next reached a floating island, where the King of the Winds (!) gave him all the breezes in a bag; but, as his idiotic friends open the bag, Odysseus does not profit by this generosity. He is driven back to the floating island, and thence, Mr. Homer's invention failing him, to more cannibals, where he loses all his ships but one. With this he reaches the isle of Immortal Woman number two, who turns his company into pigs. She relents (after an indelicate passage, only too much in our author's sensuous manner), and sends Odysseus—to be plain—to hades! He returns, goes off on his voyages again, meets sirens, whirlpools, monstrous cuttle-fish, and so forth; loses all his men, and reaches alone the cave of the other Immortal Woman.

Thence he sets out on a raft; reaches Corcyra, and, after an indelicate venture with a princess, is sent home to Ithaca. Here he finds about one hundred and twenty young men making love to his wife, and conceives the feasible project of killing the whole crew of them. Our patience fails us in an effort to analyse the magical devices, bodily transformations, and so forth, by which, as we have said before, he executes this arrangement in red. Gods and goddesses, as usual, are brought into play, by a violent abuse of the supernatural. This must leave even the least cultivated reader cold and unmoved. Our religious ideas, fortunately, are far too advanced for this kind of "machinery" to be any longer acceptable. The irreverence of the whole conception we need not urge on our readers.

It is plain, we trust, that Mr. Homer's new work has all the possible faults. It is bloodthirsty, grossly sensational, sensual beyond even his previous essays in this line. On this point, however, for obvious reasons, we decline to dwell in the columns of a serial meant for family reading. Again, Mr. Homer doubles his effects. He has two immortal women, both, of course, in love with his violent and crafty hero. He has two caves; he has two sets of cannibals. It was left for Mr. Homer to be pedantic. His style is a forced imitation of the old Epic dialect, and fatigues by its sham simplicity and pseudo archaisms. For example, Mr. Homer appends ol to the optative, apparently regarding this as an arbitrary suffix. But enough of this pedantry. Mr. Homer's whole story is a flagrant example of modern sensationalism, and above all, and worst of all, this Odyssey of his, with its barbarities, its impossibilities, its magic, its transformations, is absolutely and essentially un-Greek. Thanks to the lamented absence of copyright with the colonies and with Egypt, this deplorable work is only too likely to go forth as an example of our popular literature. We have done our best to prevent such a melancholy misconception, and to deter Mr. Homer from persevering in his present fatal though, we fear, lucrative fashion of romancing in the manner of Mr. Hippotes Hierax.

Here ends this remarkable fragment, which shows that criticism has always and everywhere been very critical. There is reason to suppose that the review was from the pen of "that excellent critic, Mr. Margites," referred to above, who, according to Homer, "knew many things, but knew them all wrong."

On one occasion, while officiating at the wedding of a charming young lady at Christ church, Lancaster Gate, of which the present Bishop of Ripon was then the popular vicar, the bride experienced some difficulty in getting off her glove at the proper moment to receive the wedding ring, and a somewhat prolonged pause ensued while she vainly endeavored to bare the third finger of the left hand. The kindly vicar, seeing her difficulty, bent down and said, sotto voce, with an amused smile: "Don't be flurried; there's plenty of time, and they are bound to wait for us."

Joseph Murphy, the Irish comedian, was the recipient of a banquet in Baltimore recently, tendered by the leaders of the Irish National movement to "an actor who had done so much toward the elevation of the Irish character upon the stage." A magnificent floral harp, seven feet high, was one of the features.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Miss Burt, an American singer, has made an excellent debut at the Grand Theater, at Nice.

Gounod's latest sacred work, St. Francis d'Assisi, which has been performed at the Conservatoire, has been much admired.

The fact that the British Parliament has passed a law under which Anne Hathaway's cottage and the Wilmcote cottage, which belonged to Shakespeare's mother, may be preserved among the memorial places of Stratford-upon-Avon, is worthy of notice on this side of the Atlantic not less than in England. The preservation of every place or object with which the memory of the great poet is connected is of universal concern. Too many buildings of historic or legendary interest in all countries are allowed to go to decay, and it is to be hoped that the action of Parliament may be followed by prompt and judicious action on the part of the Stratford authorities.

Edwin Booth was born on his father's farm in Harford county, Maryland, in November, 1833. Like Irving, Stuart Robson and John S. Clarke, Booth in his teens dabbled in amateur theatricals. Gabriel Harrison says Edwin Booth made his debut on the stage in Brooklyn, but tradition holds that it was at the Boston Museum, September 10, 1849, as Tresselt in Richard III. Edwin Booth first became a star in 1856. His probation was made in the company of Catharine (Forest) Sinclair, Laura Keane, Kate Denin, and Charles R. Thorne. In 1864 Booth played Hamlet one hundred consecutive nights at the Winter Garden in New York; Henry Irving has since surpassed that feat, but no one else has equalled it. Booth was supposed to be a silent partner in the management of the Winter Garden when it was burned down March 23, 1867. His theater, in New York, was opened February 3, 1869, and the destruction of it began May 1, 1883. Booth made his first appearance in England as Shylock, at the Haymarket in London, September 30, 1861, and his second appearance in England was at the same theater as Hamlet, November 6, 1880.

Book Chat.

"A Social Meteor," is a novel of the modern romantic style, with a young girl for subject and wedding bells for the objective point.

Mr. Robert Buchanan's "Outcast," a poem dedicated to an American writer whose initials are "C. W. S." is to appear next week.

Whichever way the question of Anna Dickinson's alleged insanity is decided, it will no doubt develop the usual number of insanity experts who have no more sense than they should have.

Not excepting Her Majesty the Queen, the most remarkable woman of England is Annie Besant, Atheist, Pantheist, Socialist, editor, essayist, educator, humanitarian and the latest and greatest convert to esoteric Buddhism of the decade. Her arrival in America was as the personal representative of Mme. Blavatsky, to attend the National reunion of the Theosophical Society.

Emile Zola, it is announced, will alter the title of his next book "La Guerre" to "La D  b  le," the breaking up, or, liberally interpreted, "The Downfall of the Empire." Zola continues to canvass for a seat in the Academy, but without much hope of success. He thinks that his last book, "L'Argent," has spoiled his chances of "immortality," and is said to believe that Pierre Loti will be elected to the Fauteuil in the Academy left vacant by the death of Octave Feuillet.

It is safe to say that any one taking up the bright little book, "Mademoiselle Ixe," will not want to lay it down till he has finished it. In it is presented one side of Russian nihilism, and the story of the woman who was striving to free her people from oppression and tyranny is told with wonderful power and skill. The author, who writes under the name of Lanoe Falconer, is reported to be a daughter-in-law of Mr. Gladstone; but, whoever she may be, her book is certainly a success.

A monograph on Thackeray has just been published in which there are allusions to a close friendship which is alleged to have existed between him and Dickens. As a matter of fact there never was any real intimacy or cordiality between Thackeray and Dickens, nor, indeed, did they meet often in private life, and their "society" was essentially different. For many years Thackeray was bitterly jealous of Dickens, and, after the publication of "Vanity Fair" Dickens certainly reciprocated that sentiment to a considerable extent. Dickens was unsparing in his criticisms of the works which Thackeray published during the last seven years of his life; and Thackeray frequently indulged in ruthless strictures upon the later novels of Dickens. Each man had his partisans, and, although amicable relations apparently prevailed, there was not even a pretense of real friendship. It is stated in the book that the friendship was restored after "the Garrick Club quarrel" had interrupted it. The "quarrel" in question took place during the autumn of 1858, and it was in December, 1863, only a few days before Thackeray's death, that the rivals met by chance in the hall of the Athenaeum, shook hands, and conversed together for a few minutes. Dickens was much exasperated in 1857, on learning that Thackeray had commented, with characteristic asperity, upon his "friend's" matrimonial troubles generally, and particularly regarding "the insane" publication by Dickens, in Household Words, of a "statement" respecting his separation from his wife. The irritation which Dickens felt was increased when he later on discovered that Thackeray had constituted himself one of the principal partisans of Mrs. Dickens, and had invited that lady to dine at his house in company with a large party. The mutual jealousy which had for years existed between Thackeray and Dickens was perfectly notorious to all their friends, and was a subject of common talk at both the Athenaeum and the Garrick, and I do not see the object of now printing sentimental nonsense about their relations. We shall be hearing next of the cordial friendship which existed between Croker and Macauley, or between Wordsworth and Jeffrey, or between Boswell and Mrs. Piozzi.

Professional Chat.

A London magistrate one day had a little boy as witness in a case before him, and he thought fit, according to the usual practice, to test the boy's orthodoxy by first asking, in a paternal way, whether he knew where bad people went to after they were dead. His Lordship was very much disconcerted by the ready answer: "No, I don't; no more don't you: nobody don't know that."

Senator Sherman says he sometimes thinks he would like to round out his public life by one or two terms in the State Legislature. It would be one of the greatest reforms of the age to have such men accept an election to the State Legislature. Here are enacted the laws which apply directly to the people, and a wise head like that of a Sherman or an Edmunds would be able to direct reforms in State legislation that would lift many burdens from the people.

Another specimen of medieval English injustice is reported from Derby, the famous race-course town. James Lomas, a confectioner, had the temerity on a recent Sunday to sell a child a half-penny stick of candy, and thereupon he was fined five shillings and costs for violation of the statute passed in the reign of Charles II, against Sabbath trading. The absurd part of it was that the public houses in the place were all doing a rushing business at the time under full legal sanction.

The present Shah of Persia is not only a prose writer of considerable merit, but has also some pretensions to the character of poet. One day, however, having completed a poem which particularly delighted him, he declined to read it to one of the most prominent men of letters attached to his household. "What do you think of it?" he asked, after reading his verses aloud. "I do not altogether like the poem," was the candid reply. "What an ass you are to say so!" exclaimed the offended sovereign, and there was certainly much wisdom in the royal words, for the misguided critic was forthwith ordered to the stables to be flogged. A few days later the Shah, having written another poem, once more desired to hear the opinion of the learned scribe whom he had consulted before. Hardly had he read a few lines of his latest elucubration when the learned man turned abruptly away and prepared to run out of the room. "Where are you going?" thundered his majesty. "Back to the stables!" cried the critic, in desperation. So amused was the king of kings by this repartee that he forgave the delinquent and forebore to have him flogged a second time.

Never before had Chef Philips, of the Auditorium Hotel, been nonplussed when asked to prepare a meal. From a cold lunch to a Lucullan banquet he had been at home. And the details of every conceivable dish he had imagined he possessed at his fingers' ends. But when on the morning following the arrival of Henry Watterson the bell boy appeared before the chef and told him that Mr. Watterson wanted a Kentucky breakfast, the chef was confronted with his Waterloo, says the Chicago Post. "What's that?" he exclaimed. "A Kentucky breakfast," the bell boy replied. Not wishing to confess his ignorance to the bell boy the chef waved him aside and went himself to the great editor's room. "Beg pardon, Mr. Watterson," he said, as in response to a "come in" he entered and found the journalist in bed, "but I fear the bell boy did not correctly understand your order. He said you wanted a Kentucky breakfast." "Well, that is just what I want," said the journalist, adding a little impatiently, "and I want it right away." "What is a Kentucky breakfast, sir?" Mr. Watterson gazed pityingly at the chef, then settling down in the bed he pulled the clothes over his head and replied: "Two drinks of whisky and a chew of tobacco."

The home of the late President James K. Polk, in the heart of the city of Nashville, and at present occupied by his aged widow, has been advertised for sale for $1,000 city taxes.

A Gainesville girl has probably the longest hair in the world. It is 10 feet 6 inches long. The present growth is of the past seven years, as in 1884 her head was shaved during a spell of brain fever.

Emperor William is said to be fond of going about disguised at night to certain liquor shops and music halls where his soldiers and sailors are to be found, in order to pick up criticisms of his army and navy.

The weekly Palo Alto, published at Mayfield, has entered upon its second volume. The paper is bright and well conducted, and we are gratified at its success. A local newspaper can do much to help a community out, and doubtless the people of Mayfield and vicinity appreciate the advantage.

The longest canal in the world is the Imperial canal of China, which starts from Peking, connects the Hoang-ho, Yang-tse-Kiang and a number of other rivers, passes by the gates of forty-one cities, and with its branches, affords nearly 2,000 miles of water communication in the heart of the empire.

An eminent physician declares that a stiff hat is the cause of catarrh and baldness, and another eminent physician says that a soft hat is the cause of baldness and catarrh. These two expert opinions might puzzle us, were it not that another authority on health declares that men will never be healthy until they stop wearing any hat.

The conviction of Dolan for the abduction of a young girl for the purpose of placing her in a house of prostitution in San Francisco was deserved. The case was tried in the Superior Court here before Judge Grant, and the jury rendered their verdict in a few minutes. From the character of the persons who attended the Court-room during the trial it is manifest there are many in the city who would be fit subjects for the new vagrancy law.

There is neither heaven nor hell in the Chinese creed. Dead Chinamen, whether good or bad, are re-born on the third day of the third month of each year. The spirits of the good are injected into the lives of the sons of rich men. Bad spirits are assigned a place in the lives of lower animals. There is one exception to this rule. Murderers are never born again. Their souls are boiled forever in a huge vat of grease.

If an Egyptian's eyes ache or hurt he looks out for a blonde woman named Fatima, begs from her a bit of bread and information as to where he will find six more Fatimas, that he may ask the same favor of each. Fortunately for him, they do not all have to be blondes, and a wise Egyptian father, seeing the value of the name, is apt to give it to one of his daughters, so there are plenty of Fatimas. Whether the English-speaking maiden makes eyes suffer or not, who can say?

Whatever the cause, a child who "gets a headache when he studies" should be looked after by his parents or teachers. The pain is a signal of nature's rebellion against some maltreatment. If it is too much brain-cramming, that should stop. If it is bad air or improper food the cause should be removed. If—as those who have not forgotten when they were boys may suspect—the malady is due to a strong "spring fever" to play marbles, ride a bicycle or go fishing, a good doctor can probably discover that fact.

The Rothschilds are believed to have $50,000,000 invested in American securities. Only the Rothschilds themselves know what they are worth, and they never tell family secrets. One of their mottoes is, "Gold never repeats what it sees," and another, "A man will not tell what he has not heard," but some idea of their riches can be had from the fact that since 1815 they have raised or Great Britain alone more than $1,000,000,000; for Austria, $250,000,000; for Prussia, $200,000,000; for France, $400,000,000; Italy, nearly $300,000,000; for Russia, $100,000,000; for Brazil, from $60,000,000 to $100,000,000, and for smaller States certainly $200,000,000 and $300,000,000.

It is pretty rough on a man to call him a woman, and it is worse when you pluralize him. It is a little better before the s, which is a liar to ignorant sign painters speaking world over. On one of the many boats that ply between New York and New York the legend "Gent's" is a little better than the doors of one of the cabins. It is not possible that this offense originates with any officer of the company. The Union Ferry Company have done one good thing in putting the signs "women" and "men" above the cabin doors in place of the old "Ladies" and "Gents." The same reform might be extended in other directions with advantage, for we are all pretty tired of "sales ladies" and "shop ladies" and "walking gentlemen." It is announced that some of the shopkeepers and street railroad companies in New York are trying to persuade their employees to address women by the name "Madame," instead of "Lady," a grateful change.

Every beef animal that leaves the United States has its ear pierced. A fine wire passes through the hole, and attached to the wire is a tiny brass tag, not nearly so large as some of the ear pendants ladies used to wear. Upon the tag is a number and the initials "U. S. A." This shows that the animal has been examined by the United States government inspectors and is perfectly sound and healthy, and that even weak stonached royalties may eat that beef with impunity.

The mysterious canyon in Southern California, which is known as the Valley of Death, is said to be, in some parts, fully 500 feet below the sea level. The heat is so intense that dead bodies do not decompose, but become mummified, the heat rapidly causing all their moisture to evaporate. The valley is said to be rich in deposits of gold, although it is not known that any person has ever returned alive from this unhealthy region, which seems to be shunned by all animal life.

The "doctors" made things lively in the city this week. While our medical friends advise rest and quiet for their patients, they did not take any considerable quantity of that medicine during their visit here. With them and their friends, it was one continual round of festivity. It is always funny to hear a doctor protest against his patient drinking beer, and at the same time take in a full-sized schooner. The convention of medicos has driven the prevailing epidemic from our midst—at least it's gone.

There is something to be admired in the editor of the Redding Free Press. On the 18th inst. his paper entered on its ninth year, and he announces that fact with independence. There is much sound common sense in this paragraph he prints: "Among the members of the press a sort of a mutual admiration society has been established. Upon turning over a journalistic page, and on the commencement of a new newspaper year, it has been the custom of exchanges to publish something laudatory of the newspaper having its birthday. These 'puffs' are sometimes merited, and oftentimes are not, but are given simply on the principle of 'You tickle me on my birthday and I will do a like favor for you when you enter a new year.' There is altogether too much sham about all this, which, to our mind, is disgusting. Of course, newspapers receiving these puffs publish the same in order that their subscribers—poor, innocent souls—may see what their brethren think of them, when, as a matter of fact, it is all jingoism, a hollow mockery, and deceives nobody."

Every genuine work of art is in some sense the expression of the thought, interests and aspirations of the period in which it is produced. No one can have any difficulty in tracing in the chaotic conditions of contemporary thought, with its mixture of triviality and studious inquiry, the general drift of the modern novel, the characteristic form of artistic expression at the present day. This drift is just as apparent, among the same wide differences and contradictions, in other forms of art, so that any attempt to predict from the novel of to-day what the novel of to-morrow will be like involves a guess at the general social and intellectual tendencies of the age. Naturally those who regard scientific observation as the great purpose of art look for the development of the novel along the lines of so-called realism, while, to perhaps, the greater number it appears that the novel cannot go much further in this direction without ceasing to be a novel and that fiction must either recur to imagination and romance or become extinct, yielding place to scientific treatises on the one hand and mere triviality on the other. Perhaps artists are not always those who most clearly perceive the movements of their own art. As painters sometimes mistake life-school studies for pictures, so many excellent reporters and controversialists and students of psychology think they are writing novels. They confound journalism with literature. The reader, however, who recognizes a distinction between the newspaper and the novel, observes that most of the modern stories, however great their vogue, prove nearly as ephemeral as the daily paper, while the great novels that are supposed to be old-fashioned come back to us as fresh and strong as ever. After we have exhausted our patience over the microscope, we turn still to our Thackeray and Balzac to show us real life. Their record of the manners of a period was as minute and accurate as anything we have now, but they did not stop there. It is not accuracy alone that gives life to a work of art; it is by the imaginative quality that it lives. If we have imaginative novelists in the future, we may get some more great novels; if not, we must be content with journalism in place of literature.

THE STATE MEDICAL SOCIETY.

Its Session here during the Week—The Importance of its Work—Entertainments to the Guests.

The annual session of the State Medical Society was held in this city during the week. There were in attendance about 150 physicians and surgeons, and all of the counties in the State were represented. The papers read and the discussions had upon them, while of general concern, were of more particular interest to the members of the profession. The occasion of these annual meetings of the Society is of gratification, not only that opportunity for acquaintance is afforded, but from an interchange of views and a recital of experience there comes a general enlightenment. Of the two leading professions—law and medicine—the latter has to make its progress through the discoveries of its membership, and while considering that which the past has demonstrated, it must of necessity keep vigilant eye at the uplifting of the curtain of the present. With the law it is different. It is largely there a matter of precedent, and until the last litigant dies it is not unlikely actions in Courts will be decided largely upon the authority of Lord Blackstone, or of judges long since dead. The contrast between the two professions is marked. The one relies more upon that which the present develops, while the other conforms to dictations of antiquity.

Aside from the work of the Society while in meeting, there were social features that pleasantly marked the annual gathering. On Tuesday night a reception was tendered the visitors by Dr. and Mrs. Cluness, at their residence at Eighth and H streets. Some 250 guests, ladies and gentlemen, attended, and the entertainment lasted until nearly 2 A. M. On Wednesday night a brilliant reception was tendered by the Sacramento Society for Medical Improvement to the members of the State Medical Society, at the rooms of the Sutter Club. The orchestra was under the direction of Professor Charles A. Neale. An elegant spread was laid in the dining room. The members of the local society were assiduous in their attention to the guests, and the expressions of the visitors were highly complimentary to the hosts. Thursday night the ladies of the Sacramento Society received the visitors at the Mrs. E. B. Crocker Art Gallery, and there the installation of the new officers of the State Society took place.

We present on the opposite page a portrait of the retiring President of the State Society, Dr. W. R. Cluness, of this city. The cut was kindly tendered us by Professor E. C. Atkinson, of the Sacramento Business College. At the various receptions tendered the members of the Society, it was noteworthy that Dr. Cluness enjoys the same kind regard from his fellow practitioners from abroad that he does from the people of Sacramento. Speaking of the Doctor, one of the medical visitors remarked: "Dr. Cluness was called in consultation with me in the case of a lady, and she remarked to me that the kindness and sympathy of the Doctor did more good than any medicine." Dr. Cluness was born December 29, 1835, in the city of London, Canada, and is a son of David Cluness. The Doctor received his preliminary education in the schools of London, and prepared himself for entry at Queen's College, in the "old limestone city" of Kingston, at the foot of Lake Ontario—one of the best known and most popular universities in Canada. The Doctor graduated as B. A., in 1855, and immediately began a course of medicine, receiving the degree of M. D., and at the same time that of M. A., in 1859. In 1871 he was elected a Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons. Removing to California in 1859, he settled in July of that year at Petaluma. On July 1, 1863, he located in Sacramento, and has since resided here. For twenty-four years he was a member of the City Board of Health. Since 1873 he has been a member of the State Board of Health. The Doctor was one of the organizers of the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company, in 1868, and was appointed Medical Director. Dr. Cluness has always been prominently identified with measures of improvement and development of this section of the State. The consideration paid him by the prominent members of his profession in the State is a matter of pride to our people, and esteemed by them a deserved compliment.

The First American Railway.

The first railroad built in the United States was three miles in length, extending from the granite quarries at Quincy, Mass., to the Neponset river. It was commenced in 1826 and finished in 1827. The gauge was five feet. The rails were pine, a foot thick, covered with hard oak, which was in turn strapped with iron. In January, 1827, a short coal road was completed from the mines to Mauch Chunk, Pa. The rails on this road were also of timber, with flat iron bars. The first locomotive for use on a railroad was invented by Richard Trevithick in 1804, and was first tried in Wales.

George Stephenson built the first really successful locomotive in 1814, and tested it upon the Killingwood road in the north of England. The first locomotive for actual service constructed in America was E. I. Miller's "Best Friend," built for the South Carolina Railroad Company in 1830. Peter Cooper built a little experimental locomotive early in 1830, before the "Best Friend" was completed.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The Cleveland Minstrels, with the only Emerson, will play a return engagement on Wednesday night next at the Metropolitan.

Miss Grace Hawthorne, who made such a favorable impression at the Clinic a couple of years ago, has failed in a financial point of view in England. Miss Hawthorne's liabilities are £15,783 (nearly $78,915), with no available assets. She makes no proposal, and has been adjudged a bankrupt. The lady may learn a lesson from this, and hereafter devote her talents and energies at home.

Pinafore, as rendered by the amateurs, was not a marked success. The former productions by the McNeill Club were decidedly superior to the last effort. Possibly the fact that there were other brilliant entertainments every evening during the Pinafore season accounts for the lack of patronage. The young ladies and gentlemen in the cast did very well under the circumstances. Our young friends must not let this little matter deter them from bringing out something new in the near future.

The Presidential Party.

Pass the hat around among the p. p. for a Sutter Fort collection.

The p. p. would certainly enjoy a night of opera by the McNeill Club.

"Angels' visits are few and far between." For "angels" read "Presidents."

Don't let the p. p. get away without enjoying a ride on one of Carey's street cars.

Ain't there nobody to suggest an open-air concert for the entertainment of the p. p.?

The vexed bond question might be given to the p. p. for solution. It is too weighty for our local savants to "solve."

Manager Ginsberg is willing to sacrifice his time and arrange for a Sunday game of baseball if assurance can be given him that the p. p. will be in attendance.

As a marvel of Sacramento progress and enterprise during the past twenty-five years, show the p. p. the California State Bank building, the new Cathedral and the Weinstock-Lubin stores now in course of construction.

Our Postmaster thinks that "the laying of the corner-stone of the new Postoffice building would be an interesting feature of the President's visit to the capital city." That's so; and then the boss of the Postmasters could do the "laying."

PRESIDENTIAL RECEPTIONS.

Sacramento's Respect for Our Chief Executives—Ovations to President Hayes and Ex-President Grant.

So far but one President of the United States has visited California during his term of office—President Hayes. The first to visit the Pacific coast of those who had filled the office of President was General Grant. Both of those distinguished gentlemen met with a cordial reception in Sacramento.

General Grant had made a trip around the world, on which he received considerations and distinctions from foreign nations greater than those which had been conferred upon any other man. With his party he arrived in Sacramento October 22, 1879. Meetings had been held, and all arrangements perfected for his appropriate reception. Upon that day there was a parade that eclipsed anything of its kind that had been had here, and delegations of citizens came from all the adjoining counties. The Grand Marshal was Adjutant-General P. F. Walsh, and Major John F. Sheehan was the Chief of Staff. The Chief Aids were Albert Gallatin, Major W. A. Anderson, John Q. Brown, Thomas Guinean, Captain J. L. Jack, E. W. Maslin and R. S. Carey. The General Aids were Claus Anderson, Major Wm. Bartels, G. Bauman, General W. T. Crowell, Guy W. Cole, Winfield J. Davis, J. J. Carter, Major P. J. Harney, Geo. W. Ficks, Chris. Illiardi, John Harris, Israel Luce, D. Lubin, F. D. Ryan, Gen. J. G. Martine, M. Sternfels, T. E. J. Riley, W. C. Van Fleet, R. D. Sriver, H. A. Weaver, T. H. Wallis, J. W. Wilson, H. H. Linnell, J. O. Coleman, B. F. Stewart, Hon. Grove L. Johnson, W. A. Houghton, Wm. Beckman, Dr. W. R. Cluness, John H. Carroll, R. O. Cravens, W. D. Comstock, James I. Felter, Captain F. X. Ebner, Wm. Johnston, Ed. F. Taylor, T. B. McFarland, F. A. Hornblower, John T. Griffiths, Dr. W. W. Light, D. C. Allen, D. F. Beverage, A. L. Frost, N. S. Bennett, George M. Mott, Thomas Harper, John Talbot, Geo. W. Carey, W. A. Henry, Geo. B. Katzenstein and John F. Whyte.

The military turned out under the command of Brigadier-General Thomas J. Clunie and Lieutenant-Colonel Creed Haymond. All the prominent civic societies were represented. The first carriage contained General Grant, Governor Wm. Irwin, Senator Newton Booth and Mayor Jabez Turner. The second carriage carried Mrs. General Grant, Mrs. Governor Irwin, Hon. Henry Edgerton and Ulysses Grant, Jr. Following were carriages conveying the members of the reception committee, State, county and city officials and invited guests. The procession moved through the principal streets, and on arriving at the main entrance to the Capitol grounds, General Grant, Governor Irwin, the Governor's Staff, the Reception Committee and the Pioneers alighted. The public school children had formed ranks from Tenth street to the main entrance to the State Capitol, and between those ranks the party with their ladies passed. At the entrance to the Capitol they were received on behalf of the City Board of Education by Judge T. B. McFarland, its President, and Add. C. Hinkson, the Superintendent. Each child had been provided with a little flag. General Grant and party were then seated on the stand in front of the Capitol, and the procession passed before them in review. Hon. Henry Edgerton delivered the address of welcome. The address was a masterpiece, and it was as follows:

General Grant: The citizens of Sacramento, in union with the representatives of numerous other communities near and remote, in behalf of the people of California, cordially welcome you, with your family and suite, to the freedom and hospitalities of their capital city.

They desire thereby to interpret and emphasize their profound respect for you, and their gratitude for illustrious services rendered to our common country. The muse of history will in due time fix the character and extent of those services in permanent and philosophic view. Poetry and art will celebrate them in animating and enduring forms. May the day be far distant when the voices that praise may indulge in the fullness of gratitude that belongs to the sanctity of the grave.

It is a generous pride that intertwines a consciousness of liberty with veneration for its defenders. It is therefore at all times decorous and graceful in the generation that has witnessed your achievements, to assert their splendor and beneficence, and by public acclamation and ovation to attest and solemnize the legitimate homage of its admiration and love.

We congratulate you upon the felicity of life spared to witness the coincidence of your patriotic deeds with the grandeur and prosperity of your country. We possess a territorial domain embracing many zones of climate and flora, and extending in almost continuous cohesion to meridian lines that include a third of your journey around the earth. We exhibit a civilization bearing a genuine American stamp, which has mani-festated itself as strong enough to give admission to the diverse characteristics of many races, and to transmute all it admits into original forms of civic and social life that clearly reflect its own nature. We live in the shelter of a government in which the beauty and harmony of free institutions are embodied in visible stability and order, in societies that move regularly and tranquilly to the music of the Union, in a republic, where the unchecked impulses and powers inherent in an ingenuous people, essay and solve as they rise all social and political problems. In these glowing realities, in the fixed station and destiny of a noble and puissant nation, in the amplitude and perfection of its liberties, in the multiplicitous variety and indomitable vigor of its popular life, and in the inspiring story of its perils, its struggles and its triumphs, the discriminating judgment of the age has discerned the fair and imperishable monuments of your own fame.

We contemplate for a moment a military career, which, presaging its splendor at Molino del Rey and Chapultepec, and made immortal by the memories of Donelson, of Shiloh, of Vicksburg, of Chattanooga and Richmond, was consummated and glorified by a magnanimity that lifted up victory to a sublime moral height, and led a heroic people, without bitterness of recollection, across the threshold of a new and better era. We challenge a military renown that has cost less to justice, less to humanity, less to the human conscience.

We advert to a civic career in the great office of President, attempted without previous civic experience, and running to the full limit yet allowed to the most illustrious of your predecessors, and "In that fierce light which beats upon a throne,

And blackens every blot,"

we see clearly mirrored the lofty patriotism, the calm, immovable character, the uncorrupt, acute mind, the "chastity of honor."

We retrace your tour around the globe, marked at every point of the circumference by unexampled demonstrations of respect, and everywhere, in the pomp and pageantry of the Courts of Europe, and in the rigid forms of the ancient theocracies and empires of Asia, we behold the unostentatious republican citizen symbolizing the dignity and the honor of his country, and drawing it more closely into the great life of the world.

As Americans, we dwell upon these resplendent deeds with feelings that surpass enthusiasm. We group them upon the background of a life that reveals no unseemly pursuit of office, no trust violated, no confidence betrayed, no friendship broken, and trustfully lay them at the feet of history.

As Californians, we remember that our State, its unrivaled domain, its polity, its prosperity and happiness attained, and its fair prospect of future greatness and power, are the fruits of a conquest in which you bore a conspicuous and brilliant part. California, always loyal to the ancient faith and traditions of the nation, her blood and treasure in perpetual pledge for its security and honor, her great heart ever bowed in tender reverence of the memories of its statesmen and warriors dead, always delights to exalt its heroes living. To-day, her sons and daughters crown you with a garland woven of their gratitude, their confidence and their love. There is not a Californian whose patriotism is unmixt with a grateful affection for you. There is not in California a community or a party, a sect or a class, which in the hour of its peril would not confide the glory of the republic to the guardianship of Grant. Her hospitality to you is as boundless and sincere as the sentiments and feelings from which it springs. Every miner's cabin, every peasant's cot, and every rich man's palace in her borders, with "doors or golden hinges turning," is thrown wide open to you. Come in and abide with us.

Of Sacramento, Cal., retiring President of the State Medical Society.

During the delivery of Mr. Edgerton's remarks, General Grant was visibly affected, and in reply, he said:

Governor, Senator, ladies and gentlemen of Sacramento and of California: If I was even accustomed to speaking, it would be impossible for me to respond to the welcome which I have just received from your worthy Senator. My modesty would not allow me to say even what I should like to. With all my heart I thank you, and I thank the citizens of Sacramento and of California for the welcome I have received at every place that I have been since my arrival on your coast. I have traveled some on this coast, and in every place where I have been I have met with the same hearty reception. I can repeat to you what I have said in other places, that of all the hospitality bestowed, all the honors conferred, there is nothing that has been so grateful to my heart as the receptions that I have received at the hands of the people here. I would not say what has been done abroad. It has been all that could be done for a mortal, but it has not been for me. It has been for the people I see before me; for the people of the great country that is recognized abroad as one of the greatest countries of the world. If we all—every one of us—could see other countries as I have seen them, we would all make better citizens, or at least the average of citizens would be better, and there would be less discontent with their own country. It is impossible for me to say more, but I thank you again.

In the evening, between the hours of 8 and 10, Gen. Grant received the people in the Assembly Chamber, and Mrs. Grant in the Senate Chamber. It would be impossible to approximate the number with whom the General shook hands. The following day the party were driven about the city, and among other features were military exercises. During a portion of the day he was presented with an honorary membership to the Pioneer Society. The presentation speech was made by Judge N. Greene Curtis, and upon the roll of membership Gen. Grant wrote the following:

October 23, 1879.—Arrived in San Francisco first time in September, possibly late in August, 1852, via Panama, coming up the coast in the steamer Golden Gate. Was stationed a few weeks at Benicia, then went to Fort Vancouver, now of Washington Territory. Remained there until September, 1853, when promotion to a full captaincy in Fourth U. S. Infantry took me to Humboldt Bay, California, where I remained until the spring of 1854. Left San Francisco in July, 1854, via Nicaragua, and only returned to the Pacific coast again on the 20th of September, 1879, coming from Japan, or by the East, the entire way from our Eastern seaboard. This day made a member of the Sacramento Society of California Pioneers, an honor which I highly prize.

ULYSSES SIMPSON GRANT.

President Hayes, accompanied by his wife, General W. T. Sherman, Secretary of War Alexander Ramsey, and others, arrived in Sacramento September 21, 1880, at 5 o'clock P. M. The party was received at the depot by Sumner Post, G. A. R., Col. Dickinson's regiment who were here in encampment, and the local military and the civic societies. As the train struck the bridge, cannon planted near the river gave the first voice of welcome. At the depot Mayor Turner received the President and escorted him to a carriage drawn by six grey horses and driven by Geo. C. McMullen, lately our Sheriff. Mrs. Hayes was escorted by Geo. Cadwalader. The balconies along J street were crowded with people, and in some places the sidewalks were impassable. Flags were flying on every mast, and the city presented a Fourth of July appearance. After traversing the principal streets the procession halted at the residence of Gov. Stanford, where the presidential party was quartered during its stay in the city. Gov. Stanford ran nimbly down the steps and opened the carriage door. The next day there was a more formal parade, and the President and his party were escorted to the State Capitol, where Governor Perkins delivered the speech of welcome. Responses were made by President Hayes and Gen. Sherman. For over an hour the President received visitors in the Senate Chamber. The State Fair was then in progress, and the party was driven to the Park, where an address of welcome was made by Hon. H. M. LaRue, of the Agricultural Society. Speeches were there made by President Hayes, Secretary Ramsey, General Sherman, and Governors Stanford and Perkins. At 8 o'clock P. M. the members of Sumner Post were received by the President at the Stanford residence. Later in the evening the party visited the Pavilion. There Mrs. Hayes was presented with a handsome bouquet by the girls employed in the Weinstock-Lubin establishment, and the President was presented with a copy of the State Fair Gazette, printed on white silk and bound with gold bullion fringe. On the 23d the party departed for Chico and became the guests of General Bidwell. Speaking of the President's visit, the Record-Union said:

"People of Sacramento will long remember the 'old fashioned Buckeye shake' which they had with the President. After his address at the Park, Wednesday, the noise being so great as to render speaking almost impossible, the President said: 'Now, I cannot shake hands with all of you, but let us have a good old fashioned Buckeye shake. Every one of you hold up your right hand.' All hands went up at once, like the silent vote of the sand lot. 'Now, shake,' said the President, as he shook his hand to the multitude, and instantly thousands of right hands were grasping and shaking in imagination the Presidential paw. The Buckeye shake was voted a success."

Other demonstrations have been given on the occasion of visits of distinguished persons, notably, Oliver P. Morton, Gen. Benj. F. Butler, Gen. P. H. Sheridan and Gen. W. T. Sherman.

An Old English Gentleman's Lunch.

A few days ago we were in company with a party of gentlemen, all good livers, and included in this company was a prominent and wealthy San Francisco merchant, who has also a large mercantile house in New York. After several social glasses, the conversation turned on eating, and palatable dishes. "Speaking of eating," said this merchant, "reminds me of a luncheon incident in New York about a year ago. I was in that city looking after our house affairs, when I met a member of a large English house, with which we traded extensively. He was a hale, hearty old man of eighty. One day he invited me to take luncheon with him at Delmonico's. Of course I accepted the polite invitation. At the time appointed I was on hand. Well, under a force of habit I took a cocktail on my way to Delmonico's, never dreaming of what the old gentleman had in store for me. This was an unfortunate circumstance, because the very first introduction to our luncheon was a Santa Cruz rum punch. Such a drink at lunch was never heard of by me before. I drank it, however, out of politeness to my host. After the punch and soup, the next course was accompanied with two bottles of sherry, one of which the old gentleman drank, and I was per force compelled to drink the other. With the next course came two bottles of Burgundy, which had to follow their predecessors. By this time I was beginning to realize the old English custom we have read of in Shakespeare's time, where the great men were measured in accordance with the number of bottles they could and did drink at a sitting. Well, when the Burgundy was disposed of, then came 'Widow Cluquet,' one quart bottle each. After all this, the old fellow ordered two bottles of fine brandy to settle our luncheon. It is needless to say that, while accustomed to high living, this last dose had the effect of not only settling my lunch, but settling me as well. While I was a piece of limp humanity, and had to be helped to my carriage, the old English gentleman spurned any assistance and bore his aged frame erectly to his brougham, evidently having a very poor opinion of the American's capacity as a high liver. He said 'four-bottle men in England are common—but when it comes to six- or eight-bottle men, then we begin to respect their capacity.' Even after this story, while taking our terrapin stew with a bottle of old English ale, we could scarcely comprehend man's ability to 'put away' the quantity of liquor described by the gentleman mentioned.

One who smokes cigars will smoke on an average not less than five cigars per day, and many smoke ten; but taking the average at five per day, a smoker will in thirty years consume a nice little fortune. At five cigars per day, it means 150 per month, or 1,800 in a year, which number multiplied by 30, the number of years, gives a total of 54,000. At ten cents apiece this amounts to $5,400.

A peculiarity about the "1891" is that adding the first figure to the second makes the third, and subtracting the fourth figure from the third gives the second. Adding the four figures together gives us the century.

Harmony.

[An anonymous poem copied from an Ohio paper, and said to be one of James Whitcomb Riley's favorites.]

He'd nothing but his violin,
I'd nothing but my song,
But we were wed when skies were blue
And summer days were long,
And when we rested by the hedge,
The robins came and told
How they had dared to woo and win
When early spring was cold.
We sometimes supped on dewberries,
Or slept among the hay,
But oft the farmers' wives at eve
Came out to hear us play
The rare old tunes—the dear old tunes—
We could not starve for long,
While my man had his violin
And I my sweet love song.

The world has aye gone well with us,
Old man, since we were one—
Our homeless wandering down the lanes—
It long ago was done.
But those who wait for gold or gear,
For houses and for kine,
Till youth's sweet spring grows brown and sere
And love and beauty time,
Will never know the joy of hearts
That met without a fear
When you had but your violin
And I a song, my dear.

He Crawled Through.

Mr. and Mrs. Hugo Boggs were involved in a heated discussion as to the width of a pane of glass broken out of the south window of their kitchen.

"That pane of glass," said Mr. Boggs, resolutely, "is big enough to throw a cow through by the horns; it is twenty inches wide by twenty-one."

"And I know," Mrs. Boggs retorted, "that it isn't a bit over one foot wide, and hardly that."

So, instead of adjusting their quarrel by measuring the casement, they argued until Mr. Boggs offered to buy Mrs. B. the best silk dress in town if he failed to crawl through the empty casement within three minutes.

"You'll just get stuck fast, Hugo, and I'll have to call in the neighbors to saw you out," wailed his wife; "see if you don't."

"Nonsense, woman; I'll be through before you can wink."

Just at this point lit little Willie, who was sobbing as the result of a recent cellar interview with his father, crept quietly out the house.

Boggs stripped himself of coat and vest, and from a perch on a soap box began to wriggle through the window. He was right about the size of the opening, and everything went on nicely until he undertook to rest himself by placing his hands on the cellar-door, which, under ordinary circumstances was situated directly beneath this window, about two feet down. In this extraordinary case the door had been carefully folded back by parties unknown.

Boggs reached out wildly for it and missed. His 250 pounds had started earthward, however, and nothing could head him off.

"Bet you two to one Dad wins, mother," shouted little Willie, from a seat on the line fence.

"Stop him, Willie, stop him!" shrieked Mrs. Boggs.

"Not much! Think I'm goin' t' interfere in a square race? Go it, Dad, you're a winner!"

"Bump! bump! smash! d—n!" Mr. Boggs was through.

"O-o-o-h! I'm sure Hugo's killed," sobbed Mrs. Boggs.

"Two minutes 'n thirty-two seconds," said little Willie, thrusting his birthday watch into his hip pocket.

Some Curious Plants.

In the United States Botanical Gardens, at Washington, D. C., are four very curious plants—"Nature's Hoax," the "Mother-in-law plant," the "Lover's plant" and the "Scotch Attorney."

"Nature's Hoax" grows wild in Australian forests. The seed lodge about five feet from the ground in decayed trees, and the plant puts out leaves in the shape of heads of deer and elk. Many a hunter has been fooled by the plant.

The Mother-in-law plant or "Dumb Cane," is really the Deffenbachia seguina picta. An iioneer, being unable to rattle off the real term, called it the "Mother-in-law plant," because of its queer qualities. Curiosity of the plant is this, that if a person takes a bite of it his power of speech is paralyzed, and his tongue is apt to be paralyzed for a week. Humboldt's articulating plant was paralyzed for eight days by the same cause.

One of the mimosa pudica is called the "Shy Plant," because if a girl be really shy, the plant will curl up at her touch; and if a man be really bashful, the plant will do the same.

Smith, of the Gardens, has a creeper the "Scotch Attorney" is credited with engaging in conversation and absorbing everything said before quitting it; and that's all.

Governmental Spelling of Geographical Names.

The forthcoming bulletin of the United States board on geographic names will officially designate the proper spelling of all the countries of the United States to be followed in the publications of the eleventh census and for use in the future of all government communications. The great work of this board and the importance of its decisions has hardly been fully appreciated as yet, as was expected by President Harrison, but not only do the departments of the government follow all its decisions, but nearly every one of its authorized spellings has been adopted by the press of the country, and there is no doubt that in a short time there will be no exception taken to its uniform system by anyone in this country. Since the board was organized by the President, in April, 1890, it has held numerous meetings, resulting in the publication of one bulletin of decisions.

Most of the decisions in the first bulletin relate to names in the territory of Alaska, although a number of disputed spellings in other portions of the world are decided. Among these decisions are the following: the authorized spelling being given first: Alaska, instead of Aliaska or Alashka; Fiji, Feejee, Viti, Filschi; Governors island (N. Y.), Governor's; Haiti, Hayti; Helgoland, Heligoland; Hudson river (N. Y.), Hudson's; Kongo, Congo; Magdalen island (N. Y.), Slippe Stein; Pribilof island, Pribyloff, Pribylov; Port Townsend, Port Townshend; Saint Croix (West Indies), Santa Cruz; Salvador, San Salvador; Unalaska island, Oonalashka, Oonashka, Oonalashka, Unalashka, and Bering sea, Behring, Behrings, Kamchatka, etc.

The board devoted much time to an exhaustive research concerning the question of the proper spelling of Bering and concluded that there was absolutely not the slightest excuse for the superfluous "h," which is often found in its spelling in Germany. The old name of Kamchatka, Kamshatka, Kamshatka, Kamtschatka, in all its variant forms, is nearly obsolete, being supplanted by Bering, Behring, Bhering, Beering, as well as Bering's, Behring's, Beering's, etc. It is found that its name is given in honor of its first explorer. The report of the board says:

"When the Czar, Peter the Great, determined to send out an exploring expedition to ascertain whether Asia and America were united by land, he selected to lead this expedition Captain Commander Ivan Ivanovich Bering. Bering was the son of Jonas Svendsen by his second wife, Anne Pedersdatter Bering, and was born at Horsens, in Jutland, in the summer of 1681. On his mother's side he was descended from the distinguished Bering family, which during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries flourished in various parts of Denmark, and included a number of ministers and judicial officers. Baptized on the 12th of August, 1681, he received the baptismal name Vitus Jonassen Bering. On entering the Russian navy, however, he took, as was the custom of the Danish and Norwegian officers serving in Russia, a new or Russified form of name. This form is Ivan Ivanovich Bering. The name of Ivanovich is an exact translation of Jonassen; in English, Johnson or John's son. All the Russian and Danish records agree as to the spelling of the family name; both in Danish and Russian it is Bering. His autograph is always written Bering. The insertion of the h in the name, giving the form Behring, appears to have been made in Germany."

Numerous references are given to show that the form "Behring" is unwarranted and not used except in translations from the German, while it is conclusively proven that the man himself and his ancestors for at least five generations, as well as all his descendants, spelled the name Bering. It is noted that all the recent authorities in the English language have adopted Bering, and that Salisbury and Blaine have used that form exclusively in their communications over the seal fisheries controversy. Under these circumstances there can be no doubt as to a long continuance of the mere affectation of using the form "Behring."

Brutal, but Suggestive.

It would appear shockingly inhuman to suggest that it might be more humane to end the lives and sufferings of hopeless invalids or victims just as other animals are killed to relieve them of intense and prolonged suffering. Physicians sometimes accomplish such merciful euthanasia incidentally with suitable drugs. It may not be long before some reformer suggests methods by which the lives of mortally wounded soldiers or others, and of utterly hopeless invalids, may be taken legally and much suffering and resultant sorrow prevented. But in case of diseases more or less contagious or transmissible there is an additional reason for a speedy disposition of the lingering invalid.

Of course this suggestion may never be carried into practical use, but there can be no harm in regretting that preventive treatment for certain constitutional and hereditary diseases was not begun several centuries ago, and in asking ourselves abstractly, as it were, why we deny to sufferers in extremis of our own species the considerate kindness which leads us to relieve a pet horse from unnecessary pain by a single well-directed blow.—Dallas News.

He'd Been Taught a Lesson.

"How is it, Lieutenant," asked a young man of a gray mustached naval officer, "that with your many years of sea life, involving, no doubt, many strange adventures, one never hears you relate your experiences of the sea?"

"Well," was the answer, "I will relate to you a little instance of misplaced confidence. Some years ago I was attached to a ship on the China station. One night it was my turn to take the midwatch. I settled myself on the starboard bridge rail.

"In a few moments I noticed a commotion in the water close to the ship. There appeared not more than a half-cable length from where I was standing a most gigantic sea serpent. I had often read of such things, but had never believed in them, but I could not doubt the evidence of my own eyes. In a moment it vanished, to reappear the next instant almost under our bow. The moon was shining brightly and I got a good look at it. The monster's head was fully as large as an ordinary flour barrel, and it was at least twelve feet above the water.

"It disappeared in a few moments. The next morning at breakfast I related my experience to my brother officers, and soon after turned into my bunk. Just before lunch I felt like drinking a glass of beer, and, ringing for the boy, ordered him to bring me a bottle. The rascal didn't appear in a reasonable time and I rang for him again. 'What's the matter with the beer, Jim?' I asked.

"'Nuthin' de matter wid de beer, Mr. Bobstay,'

"Then why don't you bring it?"

"Can't do it, Mr. Bobstay. De doctor done stopped yore beer. Said dat a pusson dat sees such snakes as you wuz talking about dis morning orn't to hab no more beer."

"And that is the reason that I don't like to tell remarkable stories."

How Women Are Treated in Different Foreign Countries.

Although among the Bedonins a wife is considered as a slave, singleness is looked upon as a disgrace.

Persian women have little education and are reared in seclusion and ignorance, knowing nothing beyond the walls of the house.

Hindoo women are forbidden to read or write. Indeed, those who dare to indulge in such luxuries are often "accidentally" missing.

In China a wife is never seen by her future master. Some relative bargains for the girl, the stipulated price is paid, and she is afterward a submissive slave.

In Turkey woman is held in the most rigid seclusion. She must always appear veiled. With pigs and dogs, she is forbidden to enter a mosque, and the Koran declares a woman who is unmarried to be in a state of reprobation.

Siberian women are raised as abject slaves, untidy in dress, and are bought with money or cattle. The most capricious whim of her husband is law, and should the latter desire a divorce he has only to tear the cap from her head.

Among the Congo negroes, when a man wants a wife he secures one and keeps her on probation a year. If her temper and deportment are satisfactory he, at the end of the year, formally marries her. But should she prove an incumbrance he sends her back to the parental roof.

A Typical Bachelor's Room.

The multiplication of bachelors' apartment houses is responsible for the bachelor's room, which you will find nowadays as often out of the apartment houses as in it. The bachelor's room is not a hall bed-room or a three-story back. It is a fine, spacious apartment, which is supposed not only to show at a glance that its occupant is a man, but to give some evidence of the trend of his tastes. If he is artistic the fact is expected to declare itself in the fine virility of the choice of proof etchings he has made; water colors are held in more favor by women. If he is musical, his fiddle and banjo, piano and flute proclaim it. Oftener than either, however, one sees an arrangement like this: Above the mantel crossed foils with a pair of fencers' masks; upon the mantel, two pairs of boxing gloves. On a long, unbroken side, a panel of oars or paddles, fish nets and rods, with mounted deer's heads as climaxes; upon the door a rawhide Navajo shield, hand painted by some copper colored impressionist with a whitewash brush and a pot of red ochre; upon another wall an arrangement of guns of all nations, swords and pistols; a bronze of the Louvre gladiator; a lariat in coil; a lacrosse or tennis racket; minor trifles of a sportive hue; no pictures, except possibly some old line engravings of hunting scenes.

The effect of all this is rather confusing at best; it becomes comical when the bachelor occupant is a soft-handed swell who couldn't shoot a barn door at ten rods and never pulled a stroke oar in his life.

"I know it's asking a great deal, Smithers," said Brouson. "Well, what is it? Let's hear it, quick. What is this tremendous thing you want?" "Lend me your ear for five minutes."

Old-Time Weather Forecasts.

In Brand's "Observations on Popular Antiquities," a quaint book, we find some weather omens which can hardly fail to be interesting. Gay's first pastoral contains some curious rural weather omens, and here is one of them:

We learnt to read the skies,
To know when hail will fall or winds arise.
He taught us erst the heifer's tail to view
When stuck aloft, that show'rs would straight ensue;

When swallows fleet soar high and sport in air,
He told us that the welkin would be clear.

"In the 'Trivia' of the same poet," says Brand, "the inhabitants of towns are provided with similar portents"—

But when the swinging Signs your Ears offend
With creaking noise, then rainy Floods impend;
Soon shall the Kennels swell with rapid streams—

On Hosier's Poles depending Stockings ty'd, Flag with the slackened gale, from side to side;

Church Monuments foretell the changing air;
Then Niobe dissolves into a tear,
And sweats with secret grief; you'll hear the sounds

Of whistling winds, ere kennels break their bounds;

Ungrateful Odours Common Shores diffuse,
And dropping Vaults distil unwholesome
dews,

Ere the Tiles rattle with the smoking show'r.

Among the signs of rain recorded in "The Husbandman's Practice" (1664) is found the following:

"Ducks and Drakes shaking and fluttering their wings when they rise; young Horses rubbing their backs against the ground; Sheep bleating, playing or skipping wantonly; Swine being seen to carry bottles of Hay or Straw to any place and hide them; Oxen licking themselves against the hair; the sparkling of a Lamp or Candle, the falling of Soot down a Chimney more than ordinary; Frogs croaking; and Swallows flying low."

In the "Cabinet of Nature" (1637) the question as to "why a storm is said to follow presently when a company of hogs runne crying home" is answered thus:

"Some say that a Hog is most dull and of a melancholy nature, and so by reason doth foresee the Raine that commeth; and in the time of Raine, indeed, I have observed that most Cattell doe pricke up their Eares; as for example an Asse will, when he perceiveth a Storme of Raine or Hail doth follow."

According to Coles, when the down flies off colt's foot, dandelion and thistles, in the absence of wind, it is an indication of rain.

His Conversion Accounted For.

John S. Wise, of Virginia, says the New York News, is not only making his mark in New York as a lawyer, being now the recognized legal expert in the country on law as it relates to electricity, but he tells stories to his groups of friends that are related all over the city. He told one recently in which the joke was on himself—and very much so. He had been making a speech in a joint debate with a Democrat in Virginia, when he made some assertion about the Confederacy and its lost cause, and added:

"I can speak on the subject of the lost cause with somewhat of authority, fellow-citizens, for I was in the Confederate army, and I wore the gray, and I have Federal lead in my body, Republican as I am."

Quick as a flash his antagonist called out:

"Where were you wounded?"

"In the valley," replied Wise.

"Where were you wounded, sir?" repeated his antagonist.

"At Newcastle, sir, in the valley," replied Wise.

"No, I mean in what part of the body, sir, were you wounded?"

"Oh," exclaimed Wise, "in the head. The mark is on my scalp yet."

"I thought so, fellow-citizens," screamed his opponent, taking the front of the platform. "I have known for years, since John S. Wise became a Virginia Republican, that he was an awful crank, and I have suspected there was something the matter with his brain. But now I know all about it, and so do you. That Yankee bullet in his head knocked his brains crooked, and has left him without political sense."

Wise relates this story as the one time that he was ever flooded in stump speaking.

A Common Case.

Wife, laying down her newspaper—"I see by an article here that a cure has been discovered for lock-jaw."

Husband, with marked interest—"No, you don't say so."

Wife—"Yes, dear. It says that to render one insusceptible the germs of bacilli of tetanus are first injected and this injection is followed by injections of trichloride of iodine at intervals of twelve hours. The resultant blood serum after this treatment is—"

Husband, interrupting firmly but kindly—"There, there, dear, that will do. You don't need any cure. You haven't got it."—Washington Star.

Language of Flags.

To "strike a flag" is to lower the national colors in token of submission.

Flags are used as the symbol of rank and command, the officers using them being called flag officers. Such flags are square, to distinguish them from other banners.

A "flag of truce" is a white flag displayed to an enemy to indicate a desire for a parley or consultation.

The white flag is a sign of peace. After a battle parties from both sides often go out to the field to rescue the wounded or bury the dead under the protection of a white flag.

The red flag is a sign of defiance, and is often used by revolutionists. In our service it is a mark of danger, and shows a vessel to be receiving or discharging her powder.

The black flag is a sign of piracy.

The yellow flag shows a vessel to be at quarantine, or is the sign of a contagious disease.

A flag at half mast means mourning. Fishing and other vessels return with a flag at half mast to announce the loss or death of some of the men.

Dipping the flag is lowering it slightly and then hoisting it again to salute a vessel or fort.

If the President of the United States goes afloat the American flag is carried in the bows of his barge or hoisted at the main of the vessel on board of which he is.

The ancient Finns believed that a mystic bird laid an egg on the lap of Valmaluon, who hatched it in his bosom. He let it fall into the water and it broke, the lower portion of the shell forming the earth, the upper the sky; the liquid white became the sun and the yolk the moon, while the little fragments of broken shell were transformed into stars. English and Irish nurses instruct children when they have eaten a boiled egg to always push the spoon through the bottom of the shell "or else the witches will make boats of them." In France a similar custom prevails, but the reason assigned for it is that magicians formerly used eggs in concocting their diabolical witcheries.

Stokes—"If we could see into the hearts of our best friends I fear we should be shocked at the depravity we saw there."

Styles—"I don't know. Perhaps we'd feel unhappy to find our friends not so bad as we thought they were."

A sea-serpent, 103 feet long, was seen to coil itself up in slippery folds on the coast of Florida last month. Three reliable persons saw this creature distinctly.

Reader, the above is a "yarn." If people would believe the following truthful statement as readily as they swallow sea-serpent stories, it would be the means of saving thousands of lives. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, if taken in time and given a fair trial, will actually cure consumption of the lungs, which is really a scrofulous disease. If this wonderful medicine does not do all we recommend, when taken as directed, we will cheerfully and promptly return all money paid for it. Can any offer be more generous or fair? No other medicine possesses sufficient power over that fatal malady—Consumption, to warrant its manufacturers in selling it under such trying conditions. The "Golden Medical Discovery" is not only the most wonderful alternative, or blood-cleanser, known to medical science, but also possesses superior nutritive and tonic, or strength-giving properties, which assist the food to digest and become assimilated, thus building up both strength and flesh. For all cases of Bronchial, Throat and Lung Diseases, accompanied with lingering coughs, it is absolutely unequalled as a remedy. For Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, and kindred affections, it surpasses all other medicines.

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO.—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to Helen A. Grant, Allen D. Grant, Edward N. Grant, Catherine Matzen, Mary M. Miller, John Doe, and Richard Roe, greeting.

You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the county of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 20th day of January, 1891, in which action EDWARD DIETERLE is plaintiff and you are defendants.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: The said action is brought for the purpose of quieting the title to that certain piece or parcel of land situated, lying and being in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, and State of California, and described according to the plan of said city, as the south twenty (20) feet of the west sixty-eight (68) feet of lot number one, in the block bounded by J and K, and 5th and 6th streets; for the purpose, also, of determining all adverse claims of the said defendants to said property; and for a decree of said Court, declaring and adjudging that the title of plaintiff to said premises is good and valid, and that neither the said defendants have, nor any of them has, any estate or interest in the same; and forever enjoining and debarring the said defendants, and each of them, from asserting any claim to said land adverse to plaintiff, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made.

And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court this 20th day of February, A. D. 1891.

FLASHES.

It is a difficult matter to hold an argument with a hungry man.

A poor man can't afford to get married; a rich man don't need to.

Druggists have scruples, but whether conscientious or not is a matter of extreme doubt.

From accounts, steaks are rare in Germany—well, perhaps they like them that way.

England's policy is always for peace. The only trouble is she usually wants the biggest piece.

The lack of money is the root of all evil. Indeed, poverty is one of the great incentives to crime.

The boy at the grindstone does not take kindly to the sentiment, "One good turn deserves another."

There is a strong prospect of a large water-melon crop. How about ginger and pepper? There must be some corresponding natural antidote.

The Queen of Italy is fond of lectures and debates. She might improve her spouse's cabinet a little by administering a lecture on free government.

Annie Besant says that Theosophy "will do everything, but do it slowly." Theosophy must have had a strong hold in this city on our "leading citizens," because they act slowly.

A Roman Emperor.

The Emperor Augustus was a reasonable man and did not like being taken for a god—at least, not more than was advisable for political reasons. Addressed by a petitioner with the title of Dominus he rebuked him sharply, saying that he was either a fool or guilty of gross impiety. This rather reminds one of a story of Frederick the Great. One evening a new chamberlain, saying grace at table, began: "The Lord bless you, instead of th-u." The king interrupted grace. "You hound! In God's eyes you and I are a pair of scurvy dogs. Read grace aright."

Augustus was offended with the timidity with which his subjects approached him, as if he were a being from another sphere, and asked some one who was presenting him with a petition why he held it out to him as if he were giving alms to an elephant. He liked well enough to unbend, as where he writes to Tiberius: "We have passed the holidays right pleasantly. We played every day and kept the dice board warm. Your brother kept shouting at the top of his voice all the time. On the whole, however, he did not lose much. After heavy losses, he gradually pulled up beyond all expectation. I lost 20,000 sesterces on my own account, but only because I was profusely generous, as I generally am. If I had insisted on having the stakes which I let people off, or kept to myself what I gave all round, I should have won quite 50,000. But I prefer this way of doing things. My kindness will raise me to celestial glory." Here we have a trace of that light irony which is exemplified so strongly in Augustus' death-bed remarks.

It Made a Difference in the Count.

One day while the late Senator Hearst was a young man and yet had his fortune to make, says the Chicago Post, he and a few companions were on a prospecting tour. Along in the afternoon they sighted a band of Indians, and in those days all Indians were hostile. Mr. Hearst and his friends naturally wanted to get away from there. All the prospectors except the future Senator were mounted on horses. He was on a retired army mule, and soon found himself left in the rear. The Indians were on his trail and things began to look serious, when he called out to his rapidly disappearing companions: "Hold on, boys; there's only a few of them. We needn't be afraid."

Just then the mule scented the approaching Indians, and with a wild snort started out at a gait that soon left the horsemen far behind. When Hearst was about a quarter of a mile in advance he turned in his saddle and yelled at the top of his voice:

"Hurry up, boys; you'll get scalped. There's more'n a hundred of them."

Long Life and Late Suppers.

It is related of Admiral Selfredge that during Grant's second administration he was spending an evening out, informally, in a somewhat distinguished company, and on being joked upon his withdrawal at the early hour of 10 o'clock, replied if the others kept on eating late suppers they might not live as long as he, though they were all, or nearly all, younger than he. The admiral is now 90 years of age, and of the others present on that occasion ex-Secretary Robeson alone survives. General Belknap, Justice Miller, General Garfield and Senator Zach Chandler were among the guests.

The quickest known way to make an independent fortune is to get a pencil and paper and commence growing fruit. There is no need of any land or former experience. Figures never lie, you know, and your success will astonish you and all your neighbors.

The reckless disregard for the sanctity of the oath by witnesses is developed in nearly every important litigation, criminal as well as that involving property rights. Some witnesses are not the least impressed with the responsibility attending an oath. It looks like folly to administer an oath to persons when it is evident that it in no wise is a prompter of the truth. The liar disregards the solemnity of an oath in the same degree that he disregards the truth in private conversation. Perhaps under oath he may be a little more diplomatic, but he will lie all the same. Yet under our system of jurisprudence the oath of this reckless swearer is taken against that of the truthful person. A writer on this subject suggests that the custom of administering oaths should be abolished as conducive of no ultimate good. The truthful man will tell the truth without an oath, while the liar will perjure himself with an oath. The origin of oath taking does not commend itself to an enlightened people. It is the outgrowth of fear and superstition, and maintained by the force of tradition. An oath in the name of the deity, is only a relict of our pagan ancestors. The legal effect of placing a witness on the stand or making a statement in any official or judicial proceeding would be the same without the mere form of calling on the deity to aid him in telling the truth. The law could be so framed as to make untruthful testimony or statements under such circumstances perjury, just the same as though an appeal had been made to the deity. Under our practice witnesses who have scruples about calling upon the deity are privileged to "affirm." It seems to us that the more enlightened idea would be to have affirmations take the place of our idle custom of calling on God to bear witness to the truth of our statements.

It is not always an easy matter to distinguish between the consciousness of merit and the vanity of ignorance. A pompous, blatant, ignorant man often tries to impress—and often with more or less success, does impress others with his great importance. The man who is conscious of his merit often assumes a vanity that is akin to that of ignorance. True merit is never vain, never boastful. Others are permitted to herald meritorious works and acts, not the author. The vanity of ignorance can always be depended on to be its own herald. Vanity is an enemy of duty—indeed of progress. When the truly meritorious person becomes vain of his or her accomplishments, just in proportion are the good effects of the works and acts of such person weakened, and the individual placed on the level of the vanity of ignorance. It is scarcely necessary for us to say that we have a fair supply of both classes in our community, and the readers will not be at a loss to distinguish them at a glance.

Men are but grown-up children. Plato's reasoning with regard to instructing children applies with full force to adults. That which a man is forced to read never makes any lasting impression on his mind. Superficial and hasty reading is positively injurious to the memory. Plato said long ago: "Lessons that one instills forcibly into the mind do not remain there. Make use of no violence towards the children in the lessons ye give them; manage in some way or other that they educate themselves while at play, in this wise ye will be better prepared to become acquainted with the disposition of each one. It is necessary to lead children to war on horseback, let them approach the thick of the fray. Ye will put aside those who will have discovered more patience in toil, more courage in danger, and more ardor for the sciences." It is not the amount one reads that makes him learned, but what he digests and stores up in his memory. This loose and promiscuous reading is detrimental to the mind.

We are in receipt of a compilation, including Postmaster-General Wanamaker's report on Postal Savings Banks, press comments, draft of the bill to establish Postal Savings Banks, and other arguments in favor thereof. From a digest of these documents and the reasons advanced by the Postmaster-General, we think the plan a most excellent one. Indeed this project would go a great way to avert much of the poverty in this country. Poor people are never so poor but that at times they have the opportunity to accumulate small savings. The Postal Savings Banks afford the means to establish a nucleus to future prosperity. In such countries as Sweden, Great Britain, Austria, Belgium, the Netherlands, France, Russia and Italy, this system of postal savings has been of great benefit to the poor and frugal. Wherever there is frugality, there is also the highest grade of morality. Many poor people would soon realize the vast benefit of these small savings under the beneficent plan of Postmaster-General Wanamaker.

According to report the President of the Missouri Farmers' Alliance is opposed to the holding of a convention by the new party in Cincinnati this month. In this regard he is right. Very little if any good has ever been accomplished by third parties, and as a rule they have ascended with the blaze of a skyrocket and fallen like the stick in darkness and oblivion. Each State has a uniform history of ephemeral political organizations. Uniformly short lived, they have accomplished nothing, save to impress on their projectors that the people generally are not ripe for reform, and perhaps will not be for several generations. There must be credit given to the few who waste their lives in an attempt to reform the world, and to bring about a condition of things that will, perhaps, be attained the next century, but experience has demonstrated that there is little to be gained. The history of the country has demonstrated that but two great parties will cut a figure in the shaping of its political destiny; that tendency that has existed will, doubtless, continue to exist, and at the next presidential election we imagine that the Alliance will not be in it. If a candidate will be nominated, his views will be so narrowminded, and the platform of principles so constrained that support will come but from few.

It is painful to see how many young people are suffered to grow up without any regular employment or fixed habits of industry. Many men, mechanics, laborers and others have no land of their own, no place nor business to employ their boys, and while they themselves are constantly employed to earn food for their families, the boys are permitted to run at loose ends. A portion of the time they spend, perhaps, in school, but a larger portion is spent in the streets, the very worst kind of school. There they are left to run until twelve, fourteen, or sixteen years of age, with nothing to do. One in a large number may have ambition enough to look for employment, and settle down into steady, industrious habits, but a large portion of them never enter any regular business, but as necessity at length compels them to do something, they "chore" and "job" about at such business as they can get, shifting from one kind of employment to another, and depending on such precarious jobs as they happen to meet with, and are a part of the time idle and exposed to temptation, or driven by want into dishonest practices or crime. The number of this class of neglected youths, with no wise head or thoughtful mind to guide them, is increasing, and it is time to pluck them as brands from the burning—time that employment were provided to save them from vice and establish them in habits of industry. Every parent should see that his children are provided with suitable employment as soon as they are old enough to work. Men who have to be away from their homes during the day, night, in very many cases, secure the use of some vacant lot on which, under the superintendence of the mother and such attention as the father could give night and morning, the boys might work at gardening. There are many ways in which boys might be usefully employed, and if the profits of their industry, in dollars, are not large, the influence it would have on their character could not be estimated by dollars. We know of women who employ their young boys about the house, bringing wood and water, washing dishes, sweeping and washing floors, dusting furniture and the like. We have seen boys as handy about such work as girls, and where they have no other employment, it would be better for them to be thus engaged than to be idle at home or exposed to vices on the streets. Some women, after their boys have had sufficient play out of doors, set them to knitting or sewing. Boys can learn to do such work as well as girls. In some of the State reform schools, the boys make and mend their own clothes, wash and iron them, cook their own food, etc.; and boys who have nothing else to do can perform such work at home and aid their mothers very much, besides being kept out of bad company and saved from roving or idle habits. But we think we hear some mother say, "It would be too much trouble to train boys in such work and teach them how to do it. I would rather do the work myself than undertake to teach my boys." But, dear woman, the trouble will not be so great as you think; they will soon become handy at such work, and besides, your first efforts to train them may be encouraged by the reflection that you are saving your children from bad company and evil ways, and establishing them in habits of industry that will influence their character for good all through their lives.

But after all, the grand difficulty in employing and training children aright arises from the unnatural state of society. Cities are but ulcers. Men were never designed by nature to dwell together in such crowds, living and breathing in physical and moral corruption, as they ever must where all manner of tenements, shops, factories, all sorts of human characters, together with cats, dogs, swine, horses, cows and other animals dwell together almost beneath the same roof, amid high walls that exclude sun and air, and retain miasma and all the seeds of physical, moral, and spiritual degradation. Every dwelling in a city should have land enough to employ the leisure hours of the adults, both male and female, and to train the children in habits of industry. If one-half the people in our city would remove to small farms, all, except the Shylocks that live on the earnings of hungry industry, would be the better for it. What a life has the common mechanic and the laborer in the city! Bound to toil from sun to sun the whole year round, while his children are running loose, all his labor barely supplying necessary wants, and then dying with no better prospect for his children than the routine of slavery from which death has so mercifully relieved him! Up, get out of the city; settle where you can train your children aright and leave them prosperous, virtuous, independent and happy. Heaven bless the children! They are the purest portion of the human family; have not yet become so selfish, cold, calculating as other people; have not been so much corrupted by the evil fashions and customs of the world; are more honest, more sincere, more generous, more kind and affectionate; are purer and better than other people. No wonder Christ held up an innocent child before the selfish multitude and told them that "of such is the kingdom of heaven," and except that they should become converted and be as little children, they could in nowise enter the kingdom. It is even so. The kingdom of heaven is love, and where selfishness has full possession of the heart, there is no room for love. Yes, children are the purest part of the human family, and what a pity it is that older people are not better qualified to guide and direct them. How painful to think that these innocent little ones must be corrupted by their seniors, be made fretful, peevish, fractious, cruel, ungenerous, and unkind! Parents, do you realize that the minds of your children are like melted wax in your hands, to receive whatever impression, whether for good or evil, your precepts and examples will make on their minds? Are you as careful in your words and acts for children as though you daily realized that you would make either demons or angels of them? If not, it is time for you to begin to think on the subject, for it is even so. The children you are training will, in general, bless or curse the world—will themselves be happy or miserable in proportion to the influence of good or evil which you exert over their forming minds.

A COLLEGE CUSTOM DEAD.

The "Bloody Monday" rushes between sophomores and freshmen at Harvard, on the first Monday night after the term opens, are all that remains of the custom in vogue thirty years ago of having a "football fight" between the two classes. This annual contest finally grew so savage, that the faculty prohibited it, threatening severe punishment in case their mandates were disobeyed. Resistance was vain, so the students decided to give up the custom, and have a closing service. Accordingly, before night, an express wagon was seen carrying a drum, which was left at the upper end of Cambridge Common. After dark, it was noticed that the usual crowds of students in ragged attire had not gathered. Soon, however, the sound of a drum was heard, and a procession appeared, at the head of which was a drum-major with a huge bearskin cap and a baton, accompanied by assistants with craped staffs and torches, and followed by two bass-drummers; the elegist, with his Oxford cap and black gown, and brows and cheeks crooked to appear as if wearing huge goggles; four spade-bearers; six pall-bearers, with a six-foot coffin on their shoulders; and then the sophomore class in full ranks. Their hats were without brims, their apparel such as suited the tearing football fight, and their left legs wound with crape. The procession moved on in perfectly good order to the yard, and halted under the trees toward the upper end, where a circle was formed, and the coffin passed around for the friends to take a last look at the contents—simply a football with painted frill fastened into the head of the coffin; while the spade-bearers plied their instruments vigorously in digging the grave. Then the elegist, in excessively sanctimonious manner, amid sighs, sobs, groans and lamentations, the noise of which might have been heard for a mile, read by torchlight the following address and poem:

Dearly Beloved: We have met together upon this mournful occasion to perform the sad offices over one whose long and honored life was put to an end in a sudden and violent manner. Last year, at this very time, in this very place, our poor friend's round, jovial appearance (slightly swollen, perhaps) and the elasticity of his movements gave promise of many years more to be added to a long life which even then eclipsed the oldest graduate's. When he rose exultingly in the air, looking like the war-angel sounding the onset and hovering over the mingling fray, we little thought, then, that to-night he would lie so low, surrounded by weeping Sophs. Exult, ye freshmen, and clap your hands! The wise men who make big laws around a little table have stretched out their arms to encircle you, and for this once, at least, your eyes and noses are protected; you are shielded behind the ægis of Minerva. But for us there is naught but sorrow, the sweet associations and tender memories of eyes "banged up," of noses distended, of battered shins, the many blows anteriorly and posteriorly received and delivered, the rush, the struggle, the victory! They call forth our deep regret and unaffected tears. The enthusiastic cheers, the "Auld Lang Syne," each student grasping a brother's hand—all, all have passed away, and will soon be buried with the football beneath the sod, to live hereafter only as a dream in our memories and in the college annals. Brothers, pardon my emotion, and if I have already kept you too long, pardon me this also. On such an occasion as this, but few words can be spoken, but those must be spoken, for they are the outburst of grieved spirits and sad hearts. What remains for me to say is short, and in the words of a well-known poem:

He then read the following parody on the "Burial of Sir John More":

But one drum we had, with its funeral note,
As the coffin we hitherward hurried,
And in crape we are decked, for proudly we dote
On the football that's soon to be buried.

We'll bury him sadly at dim twilight,
As day into night is just turning,
With a solemn dirge, by the dismal light
Of the torches dimly burning.

With pall and bier that's borne by the crew,
And a headstone carried behind them,
His corpse shall ride with becoming pride,
With martial music before him.

'Gainst the faculty let not a word be said,
Though we cannot but speak our sorrow;
We'll steadfastly gaze on the face of the dead,
And bitterly think on the morrow.

We think, as we hollow the narrow bed,
And fasten the humble foot-board,
That to-morrow at chapel we'll see no black eyes,
Or noses that show they've been hit hard.

The faculty talk of the spirit that's gone,
And o'er his cold ashes upbraid him;
And little we'll care if they let him sleep on
In the grave where a sophomore laid him.

'Tis time that our heavy task was done,
And I would advise our retiring,
Or we'll hear the voice of some savage one
For the ringleader gruffly inquiring.

The coffin was then lowered into the grave, which the sexton filled, and at the head was now placed the following epitaph in white letters on a black board:

Hic jacet
FOOTBALL FIGHTUM
Obiit July 2, 1860
Æt. LX years
Resurgat.

On the foot-piece the words,

"IN MEMORIAM"

were inscribed over a winged skull.

While they were filling the grave, the class sang, to the air of "Auld Lang Syne," the following

DIRGE.

Ah! woe betide the luckless time
When manly sports decay,
And football, stigmatized as crime,
Must sadly pass away.

Chorus: Shall Sixty-three submit to see
Such cruel murder done
And not proclaim the deed of shame?
No! let's unite as one!

O hapless ball, you little knew,
When last upon the air
You lightly o'er the Delta flew,
Your grave was measured here.

Chorus: But Sixty-three will never see
Your noble spirit fly,
And not unite in funeral rite,
And swell your dirge's cry.

Beneath this sod we lay you down,
This scene of glorious fight;
With dismal groans and yells we'll drown
Your mournful burial rite.

Chorus: For Sixty-three will never see
Such cruel murder done,
And not proclaim the deed of shame,
No! let's unite as one!

Cheers for the various classes and groans for the faculty were then given, and the students dispersed, having gone through all the ceremonies with a laughable mock gravity, good humor and good order.—New England Magazine.

China's isolation is already a piece of ancient history, and it will not be for want of European intrusion if the great empire does not wake up to better by the European instruction. The navigation of the Yang-Tse-Kiang by steamers has received a new stimulus by the addition of Chung-King, which is situated on that river at a distance of 1,500 miles from the sea, to the number of treaty ports. In the treaty ports foreign merchandise is admitted and native products are exported on the payment of an ad valorem duty of but five per cent. This duty once paid at Shanghai, foreign goods are sent on to Chung-King without additional charge, and distributed there to the remoter markets on the payment of the slight additional tax of two per cent.

Now I have sprinkled my master's coat thoroughly with carbolic water and dusted it with disinfecting powder, I am sure nobody can fail to believe now that he has a tremendous practice.

Humors of the Ostrich.

The ostrich is not a bird that can be easily brought up in the way that it should go. It has no powers of discrimination. "Because God hath deprived her of wisdom, neither hath he imparted to her understanding"—as runs the description of the ostrich in the book of Job. It cannot discriminate between a wire fence and the open camp, between friends and foes, or between what is helpful and what is hurtful to its digestion. It was owing to its want of understanding in this last respect, and to an equal want of discrimination on the part of the British public, that it has been found impossible to keep ostriches alive in the Zoological Gardens in London. A public accustomed to slip pennies into automatic machines could not refrain from the temptation offered by the omnivorous throat of an ostrich, and filled them up with poisonous copper, as if they were so many missionary boxes. In its African life, however, the chief danger that besets it is not the recklessness of its appetite, but its reckless disregard of its own limbs. It will take fright at a shadow and hurl itself blindly into the nearest fence, from which it will be extricated with a broken leg; or fight savagely with a brother-ostrich, and break its leg; or fall into a hole or gully, and break its leg; or dance, waltzing with most swift and graceful precision, affording a most beautiful sight to the spectator and the greatest satisfaction to itself, until giddiness comes upon it and brings it to the ground—again with a broken leg. It is true that its dangerously powerful legs are also very brittle, but it must be confessed that it does not use them well.

Of the danger that the owner sometimes runs from those powerful limbs, Mrs. Martin tells some very amusing stories. A sturdy new-comer, some six feet in height, laughed at the warnings that were given him when he set out for a walk, and disdainfully refused the protection of a tackey—a thorny branch, the dexterous use of which will keep the ostrich at bay—averring that he "was not afraid of a dicky-bird!" He was missed, and discovered some hours afterward by a search party most uncomfortably perched on the top of an ironstone boulder, and slowly grilling under the African sun, while the "dicky-bird" did sentry up and down, watching him with an evil eye. Another gentleman had a theory that any creature, however savage, could be subdued—"quelled," as he said, by the human eye. One day he tried to quell one of his own ostriches, with the result that he was presently found in a very pitiable predicament, lying flat on the ground, while the subject of his experiment jumped up and down on him, occasionally varying the treatment by sitting upon him. Doubtless it was safer to lie down than to stand up to be kicked; but to be sat upon as if one were an egg must have been indeed humiliating. Curious, too, is the account that the author gives of the camps or little kingdoms that the ostriches mark out for themselves, with invisible, but never to be encroached upon, boundaries. Inside that camp it will bear no intrusion; but outside it, in the domain of its neighbor, it is profoundly indifferent to the stranger's wanderings. Nor is it safe for the farmer to presume upon his former acquaintance with any bird, for the ostrich has not wits enough to distinguish an old friend from a new intruder, nor sufficient respect for his owner to except him from his suspicious hostilities, though it would appear that, as a rule, he will manifest a stronger aversion to the Kaffir or Hottentot than to a white man.—London Spectator.

"What are you givin' us?" yelled a down-town grocer in an excited way, Tuesday, to an Auburn friend who had just slam-banged his hat down on his head and whirled him around so violently that he fell on a potato-barrel and skinned his elbow.

"I'm takin' boxin' lessons," said his friend, "and that's the marine swing."

"That's it, is it?" said the grocer, as he grabbed the Auburn man, jammed him under a meat bench, kicked the visible portion of his anatomy and hit him hard with a broom. "How do you like that? That's the Cape Code poke, otherwise known as pot-luck. Next time you come round here with your new tricks just remember that there's a few of us old ones left who know a twist or two when we were young."

Both men were flushed and both were mad and both smiled.

The hottest region on earth is on the southwestern coast of Persia, where Persia borders the gulf of the same name. For forty consecutive days during the months of July and August the thermometer has been known not to fall lower than 100 degrees Fahrenheit, night or day. The smallest republic in the world is said to be Franceville, one of the islands of the New Hebrides. The inhabitants consist of 40 Europeans and 500 black workmen employed by a French company.

The favorite drink in Tombstonc is the Arizona cocktail, the principal ingredients of which are very fiery whisky and Worcestershire and Tabasco sauce. When an old Tombstoner can beguile an Eastern tenderfoot into drinking one of these cocktails he feels that he has perpetrated the funniest kind of a practical joke.

The bird called the "devil bird of La Souffriere" by both Labat and Dutertre, has webbed feet like a duck or a goose and claws like a bird of prey, a sharp and curved bill, and large eyes, which cannot bear the light of day. When surprised in the daytime at a distance from its nest it will run or fly against everything in its way. Father Dutertre, in his description of Guadeloupe, where the volcano of La Souffriere is situated, says that the natives call the bird by a name which means "devil," and that they do so on account of a popular belief among them that the bird nests in the very crater of the volcanoes at a place inaccessible to man, among the melting lava and sulphurous fumes. Father Dutertre finishes his account of the devil bird in these words: "Here we have a bird of wonderful and surprising ingenuity, which fishes by the light of a volcano and hatches its eggs by the warmth of its gaseous discharges."

It would be interesting, though not unprecedented, if a side issue like the opium tax in India should prove to be the rock on which the Salisbury government should split. There has been a decided advance in English public opinion since the days when England went to war to force opium on China. The practically unimportant defeat of the Government the other day on a small vote may grow into considerable importance from the declaration that it will ignore the vote in the Commons. If the Government refuses to recognize the authority of the House, on which it depends for existence, it may produce a very pretty row.

Several calamities to men endowed by nature with long beards have been reported in the last few months; but so far there has been nothing to compare with the melancholy condition of the man described by Edward Lear in one of his books of "Nonsense":

There was an Old Man with a beard,
Who said, "It is just as I feared!—
Two Owls and a Hen, four Larks and a Wren,
Have all built their nests in my beard."

Here are some French advertisements: "A governess—with diploma—would like to accompany a musical lady to the country and on the piano." Here is another: "Wanted—A French nurse who loves children of 3, 5 and 8 years." And here is the queerest: "Wanted—A professor to come twice a week to the house of a noble family in order to reform the pronunciation of a parrot."

A New York statistician and financier figures that out of 20,000 men only 8,000 will die worth over $10,000, and only 8,000 who can be called rich. He says that 3,000 men lose $2,000 and upward per year, and that 2,000 men lose $10,000 each where one makes $100,000.

The prudent public speaker in Ireland never goes on the hustings without a roll of sticking plaster and a bottle of arnica in his pocket.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

M. Pjrlus-Klentsky is a new pianist who is making a name for himself. He needs it, badly.

Surprise may take a man's breath away, but the chap who goes out between acts will prefer the clove.

Stuart Robson will produce The Cadi next season. It is by Bill Nye, and its plot is suggested by the humorist's experience as a frontier Justice of the Peace.

William Collier and Charlie Reed announce that they will have none of the "tight-laced-short-skirted-high kicking soubrette" element in their new production.

The many friends of Mr. John T. Ford, the veteran theatrical manager, of Baltimore, are pleased with the success his daughter, Miss Mattie Ford, is meeting with in her stage work. Under the tutelage of Julia Marlowe and with her own adaptability for the stage her friends have reason to expect much of her.

Mme. Modjeska, after filling several successful engagements in Germany and Poland, has gone to Lakopane, in the Carpathian mountains, for rest and recreation. She has given her son a handsome villa there which she owned. Mme. Modjeska will sail from Bremen for New York about the end of June and go to her ranch in Southern California for the summer. Her next American tour will commence the latter part of September and will be under the management of Frank G. Cotter.

The Mirror takes exceptions to the remarks of W. J. Florence when he says that "the first night settles a play," and he cites Married, Rescued and The Old Stager, which the critics proclaimed successes, as examples that bear out his theory. But how about The Wife, which was condemned on its first performance and was afterwards licked into a substantial success? And how about The Banker's Daughter, Held by the Enemy, Shenandoah, Joshua Whitcomb, Hazel Kirke, Dr. Bill, Paul Kewar, and Money Mad—all first-night failures.

An actor told the following story the other evening:

He was on a train which was coming into New York. In the seat before him sat two countrymen who were evidently on their way to the theater. They began to talk about actors, and one of them said: "These actors get awful big salaries. I don't see how they can afford to pay them so much. Now there's X——. They say he gets $200 a week and the cast of characters. Just think of it. Two—hund—red—dol—lars and the cast—of—char—ac—ters! And the cast—of—char—ac—ters! That seems a wicked waste of money!"

Dr. Constantin James relates the case of a young Parisian actress who was playing a leading part in melodrama. It was characteristic of the spirit of her impersonation that she should portray by mimic action feelings of suppressed anger. This she did by biting her lips so severely as almost to cause them to bleed. In so doing she absorbed the unusually thick coating of vermilion with which she had colored them, forgetting in the height of her simulated passion to apply her handkerchief to her mouth. No sooner had she left the stage than she complained of violent internal pains, and was seized with a fit of trembling, betraying the symptoms of poisoning by mercury. Mlle. Mars, the great actress, was in the habit, up to a very great age, of dyeing her hair, in view of presenting a youthful appearance, until a repeated use of the dye produced a cerebral inflammation which caused her death, after suffering pain for only one night.

The American actor has many virtues and good points. He is quick, ingenious, active, subtle, confident, ambitious. His natural equipment is superior to his English rival's and inferior only to that of the French comedian. He has humor and feeling and versatility. He is decidedly popular, and he is well paid. With all these talents and advantages to help him he should—and would—have won much wider fame and prestige than he now boasts but for two faults—a certain sloth of mind, which makes him careless of culture, and a tendency to fancy that the world has nothing else to do but to admire him. There are remarkable exceptions to the rule, which will suggest themselves. But the rule is as we state it. The American actor does not read or think or observe enough outside of the theater. He is too prone to overrate his own deserts, too contemptuous of his neighbors, too apt to underrate the worth of brains, especially the brains of the authors by whom he lives, on whom he thrives and without whom he would perish. He looks at the world through glasses which distort facts. In his own mind he is the cause and the crown of the stage. It is for him, and him alone, that millionaires build theaters, that managers direct them, that playwrights invent plots and that the public pays its dollars. His feeling for the manager is tempered by respect, for he knows that he gets his bread and butter from him. For the author he has little but indifference or scorn. What is he but a poor devil engaged to write lines for him to speak? We refer, of course, to the average actor, the rank and file of the profession, not to the Booths and Drews and Jeffersons. And we feel sure that every playwright who has had experience of the "perfesh" and every manager would privately confirm what we say publicly. The stage is in a topsy-turvy state here just now. Culture goes for little. Brains are bought by the pound. The man who interprets (when he does not misinterpret) plays, makes more money and is more flattered and be-puffed than the writer who creates them.

Book Chat.

Mythology tells us that the sylvan god Pan invented reed pipes, but doesn't state whether the bowls were of clay or corn-cobs.

"Mercy!" exclaimed Mrs. Dullard at the reception, "what an extraordinary girl that Miss Hub is." "Extraordinary?" some one asked. "In what way?" "Why, they say she knows Sanscrit. Now, who ever heard of him?"

Walter Besant, William Black and others are talking about organizing a society of English authors to establish in New York a printing house where first copies of their books, necessitated by the new copyright law, can be printed simultaneously with the making of the book in England.

In the "Beau Brummell" controversy letters have now been published by Mr. Mansfield, the real author, Mr. William Winter, with whom the play originated, and Mr. Clyde Fitch, who wrote the work entire without collaboration. If the drama had been a failure instead of a success, which one of these gentlemen would have rushed in to claim the honor of its production?

Farjeon, the English novelist, has more than one style, and his latest book, "Merry, Merry Boys," is in his simpler manner, though it is stronger than some of the author's tales with elaborate plots. The "boys" are two men who start in search of their respective fortunes. When they reach old age one has made a great deal of money and lost it without getting any comfort out of it, while the other succeeds at the one object of his life.

Professional Chat.

A Philadelphia surgeon has dissected and mounted the complete nervous system of a human being, something never before accomplished.

A physician who is continually prescribing cold water for all manner of diseases, complains of having fallen overboard. "You shouldn't grumble about that," consoled a friend; "you only tumbled into your own medicine chest."

Lawyer—Do you live with your husband? Witness—No, sir. Lawyer—Are you divorced? Witness—I don't know. Lawyer—Eh? What's that? You don't know? Witness—Certainly not. My husband never takes me into his confidence.

"Make somebody else happy," was the prescription given by a wise physician to a victim of nervous depression. The doctors who assembled in this city last week made a most practical application of this prescription. They made everybody happy.

The Congregationalist tells of a unique request for prayer which a minister recently received. The request read: "The prayers of this congregation are requested for a man who is getting rich." When he actually becomes rich, he will probably keep the brethren pretty busy praying.

Judge Prentice made a queer remark recently in the the Superior Court, New Haven, Conn. Ex-Judge Stoddard and lawyer Judson had a little tilt about the admission of some testimony, and Judge Prentice had to decide. "Well," replied his honor, rubbing his chin, "I don't think it is admissible at this stage of the game. I mean," he quickly added, "at this stage of the trial." We wonder if any of our judges know anything about the American game of "draw." Wonder if any judge ever said, "Damn the world by quarter sections," when he had a "pat hand" beaten.

Chivalrous southern spirit received a crushing blow down at Rome, Ga., the other day. During the course of a murder trial the remarks of one of the lawyers mightily offended several gentlemen of "honah," and they made loud talk to the effect that unless the lawyer retracted, they would shoot him on sight, sah. Judge Maddox occupied the bench, and these threats coming to his ears, he stopped the trial long enough to say: "If there is any apology to be made, it will be made to this court, and to no one else. If any man is detected within this court-room with a weapon on his person, it will cost him just $1,000, twelve months in the penitentiary, and six months in the chain-gang. If any member of this bar is interfered with in any other way it will cost the person who interferes $200, and twenty days in the chain-gang. That's all I have to say, and now let anybody who wants to interfere with this court begin right now." Nobody interfered, the judge's inducements being insufficient.

The strange spectacle is witnessed in England, and is greatly disturbing London legal circles, of a distinguished judge upon the bench who has shown undoubted evidence of insanity. Hon. Sir James Fitzjames Stephen, one of the most eminent judges on the Queen's bench division of the high court of justice, has been observed for some time to act strangely, but recent events have proved, beyond a doubt, that the unfortunate gentleman is fast losing control of his faculties. With that singular fallacy, however, that frequently accompanies diseases of the brain, the patient believes himself in good health, and refuses to listen to hints suggesting his retirement. As a result it is said that the court presided over by the learned judge is thoroughly demoralized, and the lawyers are panic stricken, not knowing what course to pursue under the embarrassing circumstances. It seems that in one case before him—a suit for seduction, with promise of marriage—by direction of the judge, the jury brought in a verdict that the defendant was not the father of the child, and yet gave the plaintiff very substantial damages. This, and other instances, have induced practitioners to hope for a medical opinion, to the effect that the justice is not fit for duty. Such opinion does not seem forthcoming, though the latest news is that the Lord Chief Justice has induced him to refrain from sitting in court pending a thorough medical examination of his condition. Justice Stephen, it appears, was greatly affected at the time by the popular clamor against his treatment of the Maybrick case. He has achieved much fame in legal circles as the author of the code for India, of a digest of the law of evidence and of the criminal law of England. He was for some years the legal member of the Governor-General's council in India—a place once filled by Macauley, and more recently by Sir Henry Maine.—Central Law Journal.

The Boston lover staggered as she refused him. "I could stand rejection, Miss Beaconstreet, but the manner of it I can never forget." "I did not mean to increase your sorrow." "It is not that, but you said you would 'never marry no man!' Oh, the grammar of it, Miss Beaconstreet, the grammar of it!" And he reeled dazedly to the sidewalk.

WELCOME.

To-day the citizens of Sacramento will extend an appropriate welcome to the President of the United States. Though his stay will be short among us, opportunity will be afforded to give ample testimony of the esteem in which we hold both the man and the dignified office he occupies. This will be the second occasion when a President visited this State. As a rule our Presidents have traveled but little during their official incumbency, and the journeys they made were extended to but a short distance from the national capital. During the war President Lincoln visited the more prominent battle-grounds, but usually his object was to consult with the generals in the field. President Johnson made an extended trip through the West, but did not visit the western half of the national domain. President Hayes came as far as California. President Cleveland went west no farther than Indiana. From the published accounts the tour of President Harrison has been extremely gratifying, not only to him but to the people, and reasonably much benefit will result from it.

It is a matter of regret that there was the marring at San Francisco by reason of the unpardonable selfishness of a few aspiring politicians, in the snub that was attempted to Gov. Markham. It was immediately observed by the President, and he doubtless saw through it, and admired the plucky action of our State executive. We are of the opinion that the men who endeavored so shabbily to curry the favor of the President will find they have impressed him with their conspicuous smallness.

In this community arrangements for the reception have been perfected with but little friction. We are not aware that any one of the seventy-six gentlemen sought their appointments, and perhaps no one of them will crowd so closely to the President as to jeopardize his toes. However, that the reception will be a success, it will be of gratification that the President will recognize that Sacramento contains a population beyond the number of twenty-four.

The Committee of Arrangements is to be congratulated that they determined to exclude foreign flags from the procession and to require participants to march under the American colors only. It would seem that persons of foreign birth who have accepted the privilege of naturalization should manifest their good faith by recognizing the flag of the United States, and it is not at all likely that were a party of Americans naturalized in a foreign country they would insist upon parading on state occasions under the stars and stripes. The fact is, very few Americans naturalize abroad, and those in foreign countries in the display of American colors, being citizens of the United States, do so in compliment of the nation in which they are sojourning. We hope the precedent established by the committee here will be followed elsewhere.

Mrs. Gladstone.

She is one of the most charming women you ever saw, a sweet, kind face framed in full, soft, lovely hair, and topped by a cap of velvet and lace. A gown that falls in artistic folds and doesn't rustle, and a way of looking at you as if she were interested in everything you said—that's Mrs. Gladstone. She does not care for society, as it is meant by the round of balls and receptions, and the giving and going to them; but she is delighted when she is at the head of her own dinner table and has about her a circle of friends who know and love her and Mr. Gladstone.

Unlike the wife of any other prime minister, she never went in for having a salon for surrounding herself with rich and powerful friends, who would simply care to be received at the house of a prime minister, and yet have no real interest in the cause which he so thoroughly and earnestly championed. Instead, she has given her time to caring for him; to see that he was, under any and all circumstances, as comfortable as possible, and that in this way his health was preserved for the nation for whom he did so much good.

Her happiest moments are when she is with her husband at Harwarden, but on every important occasion she has always been by his side. Just remember that this means going over the country in railway trains, being for hours on open-air platforms, and then you will understand why the people of England worship Mrs. Gladstone as a heroine.

NOTES.

According to scientists, "eating too much starves the brain," and eating too little starves the stomach. And there you are.

Henry Watterson seems to be seriously thinking of getting angry and refusing to nominate either Cleveland or Hill for President in 1892.

Hard times, decreed by nature, are the best damper for warlike propensities and the most efficient preventive of the hard times resulting from war.

Ex-Senator Blair's diplomatic relations with China have been cut short. He, however, does not despair of securing diplomatic favor, for he says the Japan mission will suit him just as well.

The old time humiliation and social disgrace do not attach to a divorce any more; at least not in what is called nowadays the "best society." Too often only the woman's side of the case is listened to.

Next to nature herself, honest love is the one thing which never grows old or unattractive. It appeals to the sympathy and interest of all—young and old, rich and poor, great and humble, cultured and uncultured.

An Eastern physician favors heroic treatment for the gripe, and prescribes four-grain pills of asafetida every four hours for the disease. He considers asafetida as much of a specific for the gripe as quinine is for ague.

Taking all the departments at Washington together, with their branches, it is probable that they consume about 24,000 pounds of ice daily, averaging the year around. This makes a total annual consumption of a good deal over 4,000 tons.

The Kentucky Constitutional Convention has finished its work, after a session of 199 days. The proposed changes will be voted upon next August. There are about 21,000 words in the new Constitution. The old one contained 12,580 words.

Another preacher, one Rev. Bridgman, of New York, has discarded the doctrine of eternal damnation, and in order to be consistent has resigned his pastorate. It seems strange that men of learning, and with all the elements of reason, still adhere to their old legends of paganism.

It seems to baffle medical skill to remove the cork from preacher Bostwell's throat. The removal of corks from the necks of bottles is not so difficult a task, though the ultimate effect has proved about as disastrous as that which affects the preacher.

Nearly thirty thousand immigrants from Europe were landed on our shores during the month of March. Of these 7,869 were from Italy, 7,087 from Germany, 4,386 from Great Britain and Ireland, 3,589 from Hungary, 3,484 from Austria and 2,923 from Russia.

The olfactometer recently exhibited to the Academy of Sciences in Paris is a little apparatus for testing the smelling powers of individuals. It determines the weight of odorous vapor in a cubic centimeter of air which is perceptible by the olfactory sense of a person.

Londoners consume 30,000,000 gallons of milk—or what is sold as milk—per annum and pay £50,000 for it. London milk has just now a bad notoriety. Of the samples examined last year by the local government board inspectors 21 per cent. were found to be adulterated.

A Pennsylvania law makes swearing an offense punishable by fine or imprisonment. Ex-Mayor G. W. Stroth of Sunbury was arrested, charged with swearing twenty seven times. He was fined 63 cents an oath with costs, making $20 in all, which made him swear worse than ever.

Live cattle are being shipped from Western ranges to Switzerland. The cattle are transported by rail to New York, thence by steamship to Antwerp, Holland, thence by rail to Zurich, Switzerland, where they arrive in less than three weeks from Chicago. Beef sells in Zurich at 17 cents per pound.

In the report of the recent count of the monies in the State treasury, there is the item that in gold there is on hand $3,959,140.21. While it is gratifying so large an amount of gold is stored in the coffers of the Golden State, it is difficult to account for that twenty-one cents. Gold does not come in that denomination.

Father Ignatius, the English monk, says he regrets the necessity for attacking certain heretics of the Episcopal church, the more especially as he is a foreigner. Ignatius is altogether mistaken about the necessity—it doesn't exist. As for foreigners bobbing up and showing us how to conduct our affairs in all the walks of life, we are too well accustomed to that to protest much.

By virtue of an Act of the late Legislature, executions of the death sentence are henceforth to be confined to the State prisons. Within ten days from the date of pronouncing sentence, the Sheriff of the county in which the condemned man is confined must deliver him to the Warden of one of the State prisons. The hangings are to be privately conducted within the prison walls.

A leather apron, not long ago, played a prominent part in a mayoralty election at Oswego, New York. An opposition paper sneered at John Kehoe, a young blacksmith and the Democratic nominee, as the leather-apron candidate. The workingmen at once resented the slur. Campaign badges and banners in the form of leather aprons became thick, and Mr. Kehoe went into the office with the largest majority ever given for Mayor in the city.

A Polish wedding took place at Hurley, Wis., recently, at which a curious proceeding, said to be a custom, was noticed. Instead of the invited guests each bringing a present, they waited until the wedding dinner was over, then the plates were removed, washed and brought back, when the assembled guests threw silver dollars against the plates until all of them were broken. The couple received nearly seven hundred dollars in this manner.

Few people can form a definite idea of what is involved in the expression "an inch of rain." It may aid such to follow this curious calculation: An acre is equal to 6,272,640 square inches; an inch deep of water on this acre will be as many cubic inches of water, which, at 2.27 to the gallon, is 22,000 gallons. This immense quantity of water will weigh 220,000 pounds, or 100 tons. One-hundredth of an inch (0.01) alone is equal to one ton of water to the acre.

There is a new book enterprise called Men With a Mission. It seems that there might be a goodly amount of material for this scheme in this State during President Harrison's visit. There are many, particularly in our neighboring city of San Francisco, who have a mission, or at least try to make the occasion a mission to foist their individual attentions on the President. We do not have to go away from home to find this mission demonstrated.

The Grass Valley Telegraph advocates a reform in the use of capital letters, justly complaining of their excessive use and of inconsistency in their application. There is certainly need of reform, and the Northern California Press Association might do well to take the matter up. A committee could frame a set of rules for the approval of the Association, and these, if adopted by a majority vote, would go far to secure some approach to uniformity of usage, and thus save much work and annoyance for printers and editors.

There is one peculiarity about all counterfeit notes. They are smaller than Government bills. Government plates are made a little larger than the finished notes to allow for shrinkage of the paper. In counterfeiting money a new note is pasted on a polished steel plate and transfer paper placed over it. The work is then traced with a fine pencil and afterward marked through on the steel plate with a sharp engraving tool. The plate thus made is, of course, just the size of the note, and the bills made from it when damp shrink, and are therefore a trifle smaller than the genuine.

A good deal of just criticism has been indulged in lately by the press about the very modern habit that has grown into common use of attributing death in the majority of cases to "heart failure," for the want of a better cause when the doctors are unable to tell what was the difficulty. As an illustration of how "heart failure" can be made to fit all cases alike, let us look at the last number of the St. Louis Law Journal. It announces the deaths of six eminent lawyers in different parts of the United States, with a little sketch of the life of each. No less than four of them are said to have died of "heart failure," without variation of the term, and the other two "died suddenly," which means "heart failure."

There is a popular idea prevalent that the minute letter "M," to be seen at the base of the head of Liberty on the face of the present issue of silver dollars, stands for "mint," and is an evidence of the genuineness of the coin bearing it. This is a mistake. The "M" stands for Morgan, George T. Morgan, who is the originator of the design. Upon the same side there is another "M," also the initial of the designer. This is to be found in the waving locks of the fair goddess, and is so cleverly concealed in the lines of the design that it can only be seen after a long scrutiny. A prominent mint official, in speaking of this other initial, said that he had had it shown to him scores of times, but could never find it unassisted.

Artists proclaim that the curve line is the line of beauty. When a fellow is curving his way home after a little time with the boys, the artist's theory does not apply. When a great mind curves or deviates from a straight line, there is always a chance for exceptions to the artist's theory. By the way, a straight line is not at all times just the thing. A fellow may be a little inclined to deviate from a straight line, yet come within the line of beauty, the curve. But when a fellow comes to the angles, then look out. Our schoolmaster, in our younger days, used to say to refractory boys when they came under the ban of the school law, as he grabbed them by the nap of the neck and paraded them about the room, "look out for short corners." This warning was fully appreciated when a poor fellow was brought in contact with the sharp corner of a desk or bench. These angles are not pleasant to contemplate. We have seen many a fellow using the curved lines in his progress home after a night at the club, and there was little beauty in the spectacle. Curved lines in such cases do not bear out the poet's fancy. Straight lines, as portrayed by some of our "very good" citizens, are not just the ones for our youthful people to follow, as they might become curved, crooked and angular.

Death of A. S. Hopkins.

On Tuesday night, A. S. Hopkins, a well-known citizen and merchant of Sacramento, died at his residence, at the age of 53 years.

Mr. Hopkins was a native of Vermont, and commenced life as a school teacher in that State. In 1854 he removed to Illinois, and followed the same calling there. He participated in the Kansas troubles of 1856-7, and favored its becoming a free State. At the breaking out of the war he enlisted in the first Vermont regiment, and after his honorable discharge, came to California and followed various occupations until 1868, when he located in Sacramento and opened a book store. For several years he has conducted a wood and willowware house. Mr. Hopkins has filled various public offices, and was prominently identified with public affairs—particularly in business and educational lines. His death is regarded as a severe loss to this community.

Death of John Talbot.

John Talbot, an old and well-known resident of Sacramento, died here on the 27th ult., after a lingering illness, and at the age of 58 years. Mr. Talbot was a native of Ireland, and came to this country in 1846. Settling in New York he learned the machinist trade, and came to Sacramento when a young man. For some years he was employed in the foundry of Goss & Lambert. Later on he for several years was Clerk of the City Water Works, and until a few years was ticket agent of the railroad company. The deceased was a prominent Mason, and had a large circle of friends here. He was a brother-in-law of William Young and John Foley, of San Francisco.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The Cleveland Minstrels played a return engagement of one night this week to a fair business. Emerson let himself loose in the old style on this occasion.

Roland Reed, in A Woman Hater, had a good audience at the Metropolitan last night. There are many very funny situations in the comedy. The play is the joint labor of the late Dion Boucicault and Sidney Rosenfeld. It is French fun. The company is good. A Woman Hater this afternoon. Lend Me Your Wife to-night.

Digby Bell discants as follows on comic opera: "Comic opera of the day? There is no such thing. Musical extravaganza, that is what is masquerading under the name of comic opera nowadays. This thing that is, by courtesy, called comic opera is no more like pure opera comique than is The Old Homestead with its double quartet. It is a hybrid, a cross between farce-comedy and spectacular burlesque. It is just what the people want, however. The public wants to laugh prodigiously, and to have its ears tickled with sweet melodies, and a mere soupçon of the latter is all that is necessary. This desire to be amused, to laugh with but little effort, is a natural growth."

President's Reception Programme.

The line of march is finely decorated. A committee will leave by special train, at 6 A. M., for Davisville, where they will meet the President's train, which will arrive in Sacramento at 8 o'clock sharp. As the train is crossing the bridge, Battery B, which will be located with two cannon west of the old Exposition building, will fire a salute of twenty-one guns.

The military and Grand Army escort will be drawn up into line in position to start, outside the depot, and the carriages will be in their places, in readiness also.

The Mayor will receive the President and party as they alight from the train, and will formally welcome them to Sacramento. The depot will be closed and guarded by detachments of the military and police, so that the public cannot crowd in there.

The procession will move up Second street from the depot to J, up J to Seventh, down Seventh (stopping for a moment in front of Pioneer Hall,) to M, and up M to the Capitol.

The military will wheel into line and "present arms" as the party passes by to the M street entrance to the Capitol.

Upon arriving here the President and party will alight, and be received by the Grand Marshal and special escort of the Reception Committee, who will escort them to the platform.

They will pass directly up the main walk, between the lines of school children, who will strew the path with flowers. Adults are requested not to throw bouquets.

Upon reaching the platform the Mayor will present the President to Governor Markham, who will be in waiting there. While this is going on the school children will be formed in line on the walk, facing the stand, and at a given signal, when all is in readiness, will pass in review before the President. They will pass to the right in front of the stand, and out between the lines of military.

After the children have passed out the walk will be at the disposal of the public and the speech making will begin.

Governor Markham will deliver the address of welcome, and will be followed by remarks from the President. Ex-Governor Booth will then present the President and Mrs. Harrison with the souvenir on behalf of the citizens of Sacramento. Addresses will then be made by General Wanamaker and Secretary Rusk.

After the speeches the military will form in two lines, in open order, in front of the stand, extending toward N street, and the public will then pass in review between the lines. The space between the military lines will be wide enough to permit the people to pass through ten or twelve abreast, and it is to be hoped that they will move promptly and orderly, as the time will be short, and everybody should be given an opportunity to see the President.

There will be no formal march back to the depot. As soon as the ceremonies at the Capitol are over, the President and party will be taken for a short drive around the city. The military will march back to the depot, and wait for the President's departure. As the President leaves another salute will be fired. The depot will remain closed at this time, too, so it will be useless for the public to attempt to crowd in there.

The carriages will be occupied and aligned as follows:

First carriage—President Harrison (occupying the rear seat alone), Mayor Comstock and Major Sanger.

Second carriage—Mrs. Harrison, Mrs. Markham, Mrs. McKenna, and Adjutant-General Allen.

Third carriage—Postmaster-General Wanamaker, Congressman McKenna and Senator Felton.

Fourth carriage—Secretary Rusk, ex-Governor Booth, and Superior Judges Van Fleet and Catlin.

Fifth carriage—Mr. and Mrs. Russell B. Harrison, Mrs. Dr. Simmons and N. Greene Curtis.

Sixth carriage—Mrs. McKee, Mrs. Dimmick, Secretary Tibbott and Mrs. Charles McCreary.

Seventh carriage—Mr. and Mrs. Boyd, Mrs. Frank Miller and Major Ramsdell.

Eighth carriage—City Trustees McLaughlin and Conklin, and R. B. Harmon.

Ninth carriage—Officers of the Pioneer Society.

The representatives of each daily paper will have a place on the grand stand.

Political Side Issues.

In another column we advert to the Farmers' Alliance and its relation to politics.

The fact that nothing practical can be accomplished outside of two parties has been strikingly exemplified in the history of our country. The greatest of all political issues—that of human slavery—had figured almost since the foundation of the government. In 1840 the Abolitionists ran James G. Birney for President, and he received but 7,059 votes out of some three million that were cast. In 1844 Mr. Birney ran again, and his vote was increased to 62,300. In 1852 John P. Hale for President, upon the Abolition ticket, received 156,149 votes. In each of these elections the mass of the people were about equally divided between the Democratic and Whig parties. Then the Whig party went out of existence, and the Republican party was organized. Since, the national political contests have been fought out between the Democrats and the Republicans, and it is very likely they will be for many years to come. There is force in the argument that the organization of the Republican party and the subsequent abolition of slavery was brought about by the persistent agitation of the question by the ultra advocates of abolition, but on the other hand it can be contended that the extreme views of Lovejoy, Phillips, Garrison and the other leading spirits, and the indiscreet acts of Brown at Harper's Ferry, did much to fan the flame that culminated in a bloody civil war, that was disastrous to both sides. We are of opinion that a few years would have witnessed a peaceful solution of the question of slavery.

The institution of slavery is older than civilization—older than history. Its origin was, of course, due to war and the captivity of the vanquished. So far as can be learned the enslavement of Africans began in the year 990, when Moorish merchants from the Barbary coast first reached the cities of Nigritia, and established an uninterrupted exchange of Saracen and European luxuries "for the gold and slaves of Central Africa." It was introduced in Europe by the Portuguese. Antonio Gonzales brought some Moorish slaves into Portugal, but was commanded to release them. He did so, and the Moors gave him as their ransom "black Moors with curled hair." In 1444 Spain took part in the traffic. Columbus did not escape the stain. Enslaving 500 American Indians, he sent them to Spain and had them publicly sold at Seville. They were liberated by Isabella in 1500. In 1563 the English began to import negroes into the West Indies. The first slaves were brought into Virginia in 1620. Opposition to slavery in the American colonies sprang up from the very start, and became pronounced upon the establishment of the present government. In the original draft of the Declaration of Independence Jefferson embodied this indictment against George III, as a patron and upholder of the African slave trade:

"Determined to keep open a market where men should be bought and sold, he has prostituted his negative for suppressing every legislative attempt to prohibit or to restrain this execrable commerce. And that this assemblage of horrors might want no fact of distinguished dye, he is now exciting those very people to rise in arms among us, and purchase that liberty of which he has deprived them, by murdering the people on whom he also obtruded them; thus paying off former crimes committed against the liberties of one people, with crimes which he urges them to commit against the lives of another."

Washington disliked slavery. His feeling was manifested in a letter to Lafayette, of May 10, 1786: "Your late purchase of an estate in the colony of Cayenne, with a view to emancipate the slaves on it, is a generous and noble proof of your humanity. Would to God a like spirit might diffuse itself in the minds of the people of this country!"

Other men of prominence discountenanced the institution, and did much to restrain it, but from the moment it was made a political issue by extremists on both sides rancorous feeling was engendered, and the result was the conservative majority were unwillingly drawn into the controversy. The great party leaders of the fifties favored a just compromise; it is to be regretted the measures they inaugurated were not acted out. They would have brought about a gradual, but certain obliteration of the blot of slavery, and would have, perhaps, averted the deaths resultant from the war of the rebellion.

Since the settlement of the slavery issue, the principal subjects of issue have been those of temperance, foreign immigration, money, and the relations of capital and labor. Upon the subject of the exclusion of undesirable foreigners the political parties are about agreed, and the matter is regarded as practically settled. With regard to the matter of temperance, the cause has suffered more from its advocates than from those in opposition. The Prohibition party is responsible for the repeal of the Sunday law in this State. It insisted on extreme measures—measures somewhat in advance of the age, and the Democratic convention, taking advantage of the situation, declared in favor of the repeal of the Sunday law and in opposition to all sumptuary legislation. The Republican Convention vote secured the election of a legislature and an executive pledged to strike a moral law from the statute books. The restriction of the liquor traffic is constantly coming about, but it will be retarded only by the attempts to interject extreme measures prematurely. The agitation of the question of the relation of capital and labor we do not esteem will result seriously. Capital and labor have mutual interests, and one is dependent on the other. Organizations exist for protection in almost every trade and calling, and through them disagreements will be adjusted to the satisfaction of employers and employees. As a rule the leaders in movements to bring the question into politics are either drones in the human hive or men persistently in search of office. The truth is, about the only issue that keeps up political parties in this day, is "office."

ORDINANCE NO. 270

Granting to the Party Herein Named the Privilege to Construct, Maintain and Operate a Street Railroad in the City of Sacramento, and Granting to Him the Right of Way for said Street Railroad over, upon and along certain Streets in said City of Sacramento.

The Board of Trustees of the City of Sacramento do ordain as follows:

Section 1. There is hereby granted to R. S. Carey, his heirs and assigns, subject to the provisions of the statutes governing the City of Sacramento, the right to construct, lay down, repair, maintain and operate, for the term of fifty years from and after the passage of this ordinance, a single or double track street railway or railroad, with all necessary and convenient tracks for curves, turn-outs, switches, side-tracks, stations, turn-tables and appendages, and to propel cars thereon by horse or mule power, or by wire ropes running under the streets and moved by stationary steam engines, or by electricity or other motive power; and to collect, receive and retain fare and compensation for the use thereof in, through, on, over and along the following streets and parts of streets in the City of Sacramento, that is to say: commencing at the intersection of O and Twenty-first streets, at the center thereof, thence running along the middle of Twenty-first street to Y street.

Amend section one (1) by adding thereto the following: "Provided, That if the cars on said railway shall be propelled by overhead wires in connection with an electric system of motive power, then the overhead wires used as electric conductors shall be hung from cross-wires, and shall not be less than twenty feet, measuring vertically, from the surface of the roadway, and shall be supported by a double line of poles, one line on each side of the street, and the poles shall be turned wood and shall be painted before being set up; and said grantee shall keep and maintain in good order and condition, at his own expense, the portion of the streets occupied by such poles so that the same at the surface about the poles may be safe and convenient to travelers with teams or vehicles at all seasons of the year, and so that there shall be no obstruction to the proper flow of water along and over the gutters constructed or to be constructed at the places where the poles may be set up. And all such poles may be set at such places along the inner curbing of the sidewalk as the Street Commissioner shall direct; and if by reason of setting up of such poles it shall be necessary to alter the watercourses, gutters, culverts or entrances to culverts, such changes or alterations shall be made at the expense of the grantee, his heirs and assigns."

Sec. 2. The rate of fare on such railroad or railway must not exceed the sum of five cents for a single fare.

Sec. 5. The grantee herein named shall pay to the City of Sacramento an annual license of five dollars upon each car run and operated upon said railroad or railway, which shall entitle him to run, manage and operate his railroad or railway every day in the year.

Sec. 4. The grantee herein named may at any time abandon any portion of the franchise hereby granted, upon filing with the Board of Trustees of the City of Sacramento a written declaration of such abandonment, particularly describing the part or portion intended to be abandoned.

Amend section four (4) by adding thereto: "And in event of such abandonment the grantee, his heirs and assigns, shall within ninety days thereafter remove the tracks, rails, ties, poles, wires and other materials from such street or portion of street so abandoned, and restore such street or portion of street to its original condition in good order and repair, and to the satisfaction of the Street Commissioner, and if such work be not done by the grantee, his heirs and assigns, it may be done by the Street Commissioner at the expense of the grantee, his heirs and assigns."

Sec. 5. The rate of speed on said railroad or railway must not be greater than eight miles per hour.

Sec. 6. The grantee herein named shall pay and be assessed for the cost of improving the portion of the street or streets embraced between the rails of the track or tracks of his railway or railroad, and for two feet on each side thereof; and such assessment shall be lien against the franchise and railroad of said grantee from the date of such assessment, and may be collected in the same manner as other assessments for improving streets are collected; and said grantee shall keep said portion of said street or streets constantly in repair, and flush with the street and with good crossings.

Amend by adding a section to read as follows:

Sec. 7. This franchise is granted upon the conditions that said grantee, his heirs and assigns, shall commence the construction of the street railway on said street within six months and complete the construction of such railway within one year from the passage of this ordinance, and that when said railway is completed the cars shall be run regularly and daily (inevitable accident excepted), over the whole of said road as often as once every hour from 8 A. M. to 8 P. M. of each day, and a failure to comply with any of the terms and conditions hereof by the grantee, his heirs and assigns shall work a forfeiture of this franchise, and said grantee, his heirs and assigns, shall thereupon restore that part of said street made use of for the railway to its original condition and leave the same in as good order and repair as the balance of the street, and to the satisfaction of the Street Commissioner; and if such work of removal be not done within ninety days from and after such forfeiture by the grantee, his heirs and assigns, then it may be done by the Street Commissioner at the expense of the grantee, his heirs and assigns, and the city shall have a lien upon such street railway and all the materials thereof for the expense of such removal and of repair of the street made necessary by putting down or removal of such railway.

Amend by adding a section to read as follows: Sec. 8. This ordinance, so far as the same provides that said railway may be operated by any system by which electricity is made use of as the motive power, is granted and accepted upon the express provision that the Board of Trustees of the City of Sacramento shall have the power at any time to inquire into the fact whether the said system, or the practical operation thereof, is a public nuisance, or dangerous to persons and vehicles, and the City of Sacramento expressly reserves the right to take all necessary legal measures whenever, in the judgment of the Board of Trustees of said city, it may become a public nuisance, to secure the abatement of such nuisance, and the said grantee, his heirs and assigns, shall, within ninety days after the judgment or decree to that effect shall become final, and after the service upon it of written notice, remove such poles and wires as may be a nuisance or dangerous to life and property, and put the streets through which they were placed in the same condition in which they now are at the expense of said grantee, his heirs and assigns under the superintendence of the Street Commissioner. In case the same is not done by the grantee, his assigns and heirs in the time limited therefor, then the Board of Trustees may cause the same to be done, and the expense thereof shall be paid by said grantee, his heirs and assigns, and the city shall have a lien upon said street railway within its limits for said payment. In case a judgment shall at any time be obtained to abate or to remove any public nuisance created by such electric system of poles or wires, the City of Sacramento shall be entitled to recover from said grantee, his heirs and assigns, a reasonable attorney's fee, not exceeding $1,000, for services of its attorney paid by it, and such attorney's fee shall be entered in the judgment and shall be paid by the grantee, his heirs and assigns.

The said grantee shall have the right to accept the permission and privileges hereby granted and agree to comply with all of the conditions upon which the same are granted within ten days after the passage of this ordinance, and shall file said acceptance with the Clerk of the Board of Trustees of said city, otherwise this ordinance shall be null and void.

Sec. 9. This ordinance shall take effect immediately.

Origin of the Name America.

The discussion on the origin of the name America was opened at the International Congress of Americanists in Paris by M. Jules Marcon, who asserted, says Science, that the name America was derived from a range of mountains in Central America, which, in the language of the natives, is called "Amerique"; and that Vespucci never bore the Christian name of "Amerigo," because this latter is not a saint's name in the Italian calendar; and, further, that he changed his name "Alberico" to "Amerigo" for the first time after the name by which the New World is now commonly known, to cause it to be believed that the continent was so named in his honor.

But M. Govi proved two years ago that the name "Alberico" is in the Florentine language identical with "Amerigo"; and that Vespucci, before the year 1500, sometimes subscribed himself "Amerigo" appears from a letter recently discovered among the archives of the Duke of Gonzaga at Mantua. This point was corroborated by the Spanish-Americanist, De la Espada, from letters and pamphlets preserved in the Archiv de las Indias at Seville, in which Vespucci sometimes calls himself "Alberico," and sometimes "Amerigo." En passant, the Spanish savant mentioned the interesting fact that the first of the so-called "quatuor navigationes" was not made by Vespucci at all.

M. Hamy adduced a further interesting proof of the incorrectness of M. Marcon's contention in the shape of a map of the world, prepared in the year 1490 by the cartographer Valleson, of Mallorca, on the back of which is a note to the effect that the map was bought in at an auction by the merchant Amerigo Vespucci for 120 gold ducats. Further, the general secretary of the congress, M. Pector, pointed out that, according to a communication received from the President of Nicaragua, the range of mountains in question is not called "Amerique" at all, but "Amerisque."

How Postage Stamps Are Made.

The designs of the stamp are engraved on steel and in printing plates are used on which 200 stamps have been engraved. Two men are kept busy at work covering these with colored inks, and passing them to a man and a girl who are equally busy printing them with large rolling hand presses. Three of these little squads are employed all the time. After the small sheets of paper containing 200 printed stamps have dried enough they are sent into another room and gummed. The gum used for this purpose is a peculiar composition, made of the powder of dried potatoes and other vegetables mixed with water. After having been again dried, this time on little racks fanned by steam power for about an hour, they are put between sheets of pasteboard and pressed in hydraulic presses capable of applying a weight of 2,000 tons. The next thing is to cut the sheets in two, each sheet, of course, when cut containing 100 stamps. This is done by a girl with a large pair of shears, cutting by hand being preferred to that by machinery, which would destroy too many. They are then passed to another squad of workers, who perforate the paper between the stamps. Next they are pressed once more and then packed and labeled and stowed away to be sent out to the various offices when ordered. If a single stamp is torn or in any way mutilated the whole sheet of 100 stamps is buried. Not less than 500,000 are said to be burned every week from this cause. The greatest care is taken in counting the sheets of stamps to guard against pilfering by the employees, and it is said that during the past twenty years not a single sheet has been lost in this way. During the process of manufacturing the sheets are counted eleven times.

The "prominent citizen" has been numerous and conspicuous during the past few weeks in every place through which President Harrison has passed or is going to pass. The "prominent citizen" usually gets up the excitement, and when the time comes he can always be found riding in the carriage behind the band, adorned with a red, white and blue sash and a broad smile, while those who pay the bill go on foot. Next to riding in the carriage the "prominent citizen" is happiest when he is passing resolutions at a public meeting. In this great and glorious land of the free we all have a chance to pose as "prominent citizens." The "prominent citizen" is an institution we always entertain more or less envy for; but we have to have him. We may sneer and jeer at him as he rides by on holiday occasions, or when he introduces his resolutions at a public meeting, but way down in our jealous hearts we wish we were in his place. He never grows old or tired, or falters in his mission. He is the same perennial person he was when boyhood's vivid and impressive imagination threw a halo of importance around him. Indeed, the more we consider the matter the more we see the necessity for him. How dreary, insipid and Sunday-school-picnic-like our public meetings and processions would be without him. He has his faults. We all have. But with all his faults we respect him, and need him, and we are heartily glad to believe that he will be with us until processions and meetings are no more.—Folsom Telegraph.

The Nile Crier.

When the inundation approaches the capital—usually at the end of June or the beginning of July—the Nile criers begin their work.

These criers are men whose business it is to call out, or rather to recite, before the houses of those who wish it, how much the Nile has risen during the last twenty-four hours.

The Oriental does everything, no matter what it is, gravely, slowly, with much dignity and verbosity, and is never chary of his time or breath. Even the form of his greeting in the street is a complicated ceremony of words and motions, which usually takes some minutes to perform. And in the same way this announcement of the river's rise, which seems to us such a simple matter, is a most serious affair.

The day before the crier begins his talk, he goes through the streets accompanied by a boy, whose part it is to act as chorus, and to sing the responses at the proper moment. The crier sings:

"God has looked graciously upon our fields."
Response: "Oh, day of glad tidings."

"To-morrow begins the announcement."

Response: "May it be followed by success."

Before the crier proceeds to give the information so much desired he intones with the boy a lengthy, alternating chant, in which he praises God, imploring blessings on the Prophet and all believers, and on the master of the house and all his children.

Not until this has been carefully gone through does he proceed to say the Nile has risen so many inches.

This ceremony is carried on until the month of September, when the river has reached its culminating point, and the crier, as bringer of such good news, never fails to claim his "back-sheesh," or drink money—sometimes humbly and sometimes, too, very imperiously.

The Professional Story Teller

It is always a delight for the Syrians to gather in some public cafe and entertain themselves with pipes and tiny cups of black coffee. At such times the professional story teller is welcome. Some winter night we look in upon a scene. A score of men sit about on low stools, while at one end of the arched room sits the story teller. Sometimes he recounts very vividly the valorous deeds of his warlike ancestors; now he speaks of love, throwing into the form of verse his visions of beauty and gentleness; now the intent listeners forget their pipes as he brings back to their minds the scenes of 1860, when feuds between Druzes and Maronites had sprinkled the sides of Lebanon with Christian blood. Between the stories the low gurgle of the water pipes sounds a musical applause, and we westerners realize that we are in very truth in the land of "The Thousand and One Nights," listening to the magic language of "Aladdin" and "Sindbad," and the "Forty Thieves"—the much-loved language that the Arabs call "The tongue of the angels." Finally, at a late hour, there are signs of breaking up. The story teller is rewarded with a copper bit from each of the company, the host is paid for his evening provision of pipe and coffee, and the men retire to their homes. The next morning our friend the cafe keeper washes out his pipes, places them in order on long shelves, and is ready for another day's entertaining.

Her Aim.

The scene is the drawing-room of a charming woman who has made a knowledge of American history compatible with fashion. A lecture thereon set down for half-past 2 o'clock did not begin until 4, owing to the late arrival of the greater part of the audience—all petticoats. A few women, however, paid the lecturer and hostess the compliment of being on time. One of these ladies protested against an unwarrantable delay, whereupon a young person looked at this grumbler from head to foot, saying: "In society we do not try to be punctual. Our aim is to be late." Then she changed her seat. The grandmother of this young person did most of her own work, and lived—but never mind. The rich relative to whom this young person owes her present position made his money by the virtue his degenerate scion despises.

No society is fit to live that has not brains enough to have good manners. Punctuality is the essence of good manners, founded on the Christian doctrine of doing unto others as you'd be done by.—Kate Field's Washington.

Why is it that men do not seem to value good-fellowship in women? Why is it that with all our fondness for informality in our association with our own sex, we so persistently surround our association with women with ceremoniousness? Why do we insist upon meeting them only with state and circumstance when we see them in masses, and with a more or less conventional formality when we join them in smaller groups? The capacity of women for genuine good-fellowship is great, as a few fortunate men have found out; but all our social arrangements seem planned to repress that capacity, deny it expression and waste a deal of potential jollity in a world that is none too jolly at its best.

Curiosities About Boots.

Boots, which are only a lengthened variety of shoes, were among the most ancient articles of attire. Shoes extending a certain length up the leg, laced, ornamented and of fanciful colors, were in use by the ancient Egyptians, Greeks and Romans. Different kinds of half-boots were worn by the Anglo-Saxons and Anglo-Normans. In the reign of Edward IV, the boot proper, with tops and spurs, was established as an article of knightly dress. In the reign of Charles I, a boot, wide at the top, made of Spanish leather, came into use. Charles II introduced a highly decorated French boot as an article of gay courtly attire. Meanwhile the boot, or jack boot, as it was called, had become indispensable in the costume of cavalry soldiers and horsemen generally, and was regularly naturalized by William III and his followers in England.

The jack-boot was strongly made, extending in length above the knee; was large at the top and had a very high heel, and around the ankle had a flat leather band bearing a strong spur. In the early years of the present century a number of members of the House of Commons wore top-boots. What contributed to break up the general use of top-boots was the introduction of the Hessian boot as an article of walking dress. It was worn over tight pantaloons, and was a handsome piece of attire. These, in turn, were superseded by the Wellington boot, which was introduced by the Iron Duke as being much more comfortable under the loose military trousers. This species of boot has been almost entirely abandoned in consequence of the universal use of the short ankle boots, but is still used by some classes in this country who stiff the trousers loosely in at the top.

Ingersoll's Limit.

At a dinner recently given by Mr. Jerome Buck, of this city, one or two Pennsylvania politicians present told a good story on Senator Matthew Stanley Quay.

It was stated that the Keystone "Boss" had called on President Harrison to obtain a "fat job" for one of his followers. The President was not in a generous mood, and Mr. Quay "put the screws on him" in the usual way, saying that his Excellency enjoyed the occupancy of the White House "by the will of Quay."

"It is about time that you and many others should cease to worry me with such requests," said the President. "And you might as well understand now that I am President of the United States by the will of God."

"Mat" Quay was not prepared for such a shock and he staggered out into open air. On the portico of the Executive Mansion he met Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll.

"Hello, Matt, what are you looking so blue about? One would think you had just come out of an indigo factory instead of this whitewashed mansion."

The Senator mournfully related his grievance, not omitting the President's ingratitude in attributing his success to the Almighty.

"What!" exclaimed Colonel Ingersoll. "The President says the Lord elected him to office? Well! I have said some pretty rough things, but I never charged the Lord with doing such an act as that."—N. Y. World.

Indian Citizens.

Among the most civilized Indians in the Union, and at the same time among those least heard of, are the Puyallups, of Washington State. They occupy a settlement which contains about twenty-five square miles of territory near Tacoma. A government commission has lately visited the Puyallups to consider the advisability of opening their lands to white settlement. The reason is that their settlement, by the march of the white man's civilization, has become so valuable that the white man can apparently no longer restrain his itching fingers from laying hold of it.

But it is hard to see why government should discriminate against its red citizens in favor of its white ones. Thirty-six years ago the Puyallups took their lands in severalty, and adopted many of the ways of civilization. They became farmers and herdsmen. There are to-day among them sixteen judges of their own race and tribe. Fifteen years ago they only numbered 525 all told. Now there are nearly 1,900 of them. Some other bands have joined them, however. Their nearness to Tacoma has increased their farms enormously in value. A decision of United States Judge Hanford, made recently, settles that these red men are full fledged, legal citizens, subject to all the laws governing white citizens and enjoying all their rights. They can now, therefore, sell their farms or hold on for higher prices, just as white speculators would do.

An extraordinarily large polar bear, the fur of which is a bright pink color, has been captured in northern Siberia. The animal will be sent as a present to the Czar. This will remind Pioneer California of the "rainbow bear," which a skillful chemist discovered in the Sierra about 1853, and successfully exhibited to San Franciscans as a genuine freak.

A Memory of '64.

R. B. Gardiner, the somewhat eccentric employe of Maurice Dore, met with a remarkable accident some years ago.

Late in September, 1864, he, in company with Jerome Rice, a well-known auctioneer of this city, started with a double team to drive to the Warm Springs Hotel, at that time a favorite place of resort on the road between Alameda and San Jose. Darkness coming on, they lost the main road near Alvarado, and driving over the bank of Alameda creek, fell a distance of about twenty-five feet.

The unfortunate victims remained as they fell for four days and nights without relief or food, according to the San Francisco Call. Mr. Gardiner was the first to come to his senses, and started for help until he became exhausted. He tried to move but found that one leg was broken. After much effort he managed to crawl to the top of the bank and saw a farmhouse at some distance. He started for the place, and was two days and nights and a part of the third day in reaching Mr. Overacker's house. This gentleman and his family went at once to the scene of the accident. Mr. Rice was in a dying condition. When he was taken up all he could say was: "How hard it is to lie here and die. How far is it—?" He never recovered consciousness and died the following day.

One of the most painful features of this accident remains to be told. The wife of Mr. Rice was expected to reach this city by steamer from Panama at any time, and the news of his death had hardly been received when the steamer was announced as coming through Golden Gate. Among the people present at the wharf to see the incoming travelers was a friend of Mr. Rice, who was so overcome with the shocking details that he lost all control of himself. No sooner was the steamer alongside the wharf than he sprang on board and found Mrs. Rice anxiously looking for her husband. Without a moment's hesitation the overzealous friend seized the lady's hand and broke the news that she was a widow. The cruel blow completely prostrated Mrs. Rice, and her friends could never forgive the man for his indiscretion.—Oakland Tribune.

A Couple of Bear Stories.

The story of the scattering of the ashes of "Puck" Meyer from the top of the statue of Liberty recalls his pet bear, which some people say had such a fondness for liquor that it died from delirium tremens. That is about all there is to the story of "Puck" Meyer's bear, but this recalls in turn the history of a bear which belonged to a Maine regiment in the war. The regiment was renowned for its fighting qualities. Indeed, it is said that the men from the Pine Tree State who were in that particular regiment could not get up an appetite for breakfast unless there were some early morning fighting. But whatever the credit that was due and was given to the regiment for its daring and valor, there was one taint on its reputation. It was believed that there were a sorry lot of thieves in the regiment, and a certain quartermaster hated every man in it, from the Colonel down to the smallest drummer boy. There was no doubt that a good many articles of luxury were stolen from the quartermaster, but it was no easy matter to detect and to punish the offender. Finally, in a moment of desperation, the quartermaster himself determined to play detective, to catch and to hold the thief or thieves. He found the knave at work one evening, just after dark, and there was a deafening uproar a minute later, for as an officer in the Maine, who afterward became a general, said: "No quartermaster who ever lived could lick a Maine bear." The bear gave the quartermaster a beautiful thrashing, and while the riot was in progress the members of the Maine went for the stores on the double-quick. They literally sacked the wagons, and for a week the regiment which boasted a pet bear "lived on the fat of the land."

Was Moses' Wife a Negress?

The only authority for such a supposition is found in the first verse of the twelfth chapter of the book of Numbers, which reads:

"And Miriam and Aaron spake against Moses because of the Ethiopian woman he had married; for he had married an Ethiopian woman."

On the margin of the bible the above passage is explained in this wise: "Because of the Cushite woman he had married."

A well-known commentator, writing in regard to this peculiar rendering of the verse and chapter above named, says:

"The person mentioned in that verse may have been an Ethiopian wife taken after the death of Zipporah, or the 'Ethiopian princess' of Josephus, or it may have been Zipporah herself, which is rendered probable by the juxtaposition of Cushan with Midian." The above are the best interpretations of the text which the editor of "Notes for the Curious" has been able to find; therefore they are given as the only reason for supposing that the wife of Moses, the law-giver, was the ancestress of Topsy and Uncle Tom.

When Herschel studied astronomy only four double stars were known. Now nearly 7,000 of them are distinguishable.

The Tomb of Alexander.

They've found him again! Who? Why, Alexander the Great, of course—the very same fellow who sighed for more worlds to conquer and was himself conquered by Gambinus. In this last case the plaguey fool has, as usual, been lugging his tomb around in strange places, and it serves him right that he has been nabbed again as a result. Although repeatedly advised to settle down somewhere and throw dust on himself, he would go gadding about. What makes his actions doubly suspicious is that he is on each and every occasion of his apprehension found in possession of a different kind of casket; once it was a gold one, then it was of glass, and again of lead, and inasmuch as he has been out of work for some time past, it is not known how he comes by them all.

All nonsense aside, these repeated and confidently expressed stories of the finding of relics and remains of antiquity, only to be denied on investigation, tend to weary and disgust those interested in such matters and make them skeptical when genuine and valuable finds are made. As far as Alexander is concerned, there seems to be but little doubt that if ever his last resting place is found it will be at Alexandria, where his body was conveyed after his death at Babylon. But really there is little hope of ever finding a vestige of either tomb or remains. Julius Caesar is said to have seen Alexander's tomb, as did also Christosom in the fourth century, but since that time it has been lost sight of completely, and it is more than likely that in the many conflicts which have taken place in the vicinity of the place supposed to contain his remains between Arabs and others it has been entirely destroyed.

Serene I fold my hands and wait,
Nor care for wind or tide or sea;
I rave no more 'gainst time or fate,
For lo! my own shall come to me.

I stay my haste, I make delays,
For what avails this eager pace!
I stand amid the eternal ways,
And what is mine shall know my face.

The stars come nightly to the sky;
The tidal wave unto the sea;
Nor time, nor space, nor deep nor high,
Can keep my own away from me.

KISSED ANOTHER MAN'S WIFE.

"You account, I'll yell young Jacob Green
At his good neighbor Brown—
"You kissed my wife upon the street,—
I ought to knock you down."

"That's where you're wrong," good Brown replied,
In accents mild and meek;
"I kissed her; that I've not denied
But I kissed her on the cheek—" and I did so because she looked so handsome—the very picture of beauty and health. What is the secret of it?"

"Well," replied Green, "since you ask it, I will tell you; she uses Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. I accept your apology. Good night."

An unhealthy woman is rarely, if ever, beautiful. The peculiar diseases to which so many of the sex are subject, are prolific causes of pimples, dull, lustreless eyes and emaciated forms. Women so afflicted, can be permanently cured by using Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription; and with the restoration of health comes that beauty which, combined with good qualities of head and heart, makes women angels of loveliness.

"Favorite Prescription" is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. It is a positive specific for leucorrhoea, painful menstruation, unnatural suppressions, prolapsus, or falling of the womb, weak back, anteversion, retroversion, bearing-down sensations, chronic congestion, inflammation and ulceration of the womb.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California.—In the matter of William Enright, an insolvent debtor.—William Enright having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which it appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said William Enright is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said William Enright, insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent to him, or to any person, firm, corporation or association for his use; and the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered, that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court-room of said Court, in the County of Sacramento, on the 8th day of May 1891, at 1:30 o'clock, P. M. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered, that the order be published in the THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation, published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published, before the day set for the meeting of creditors. And it is further ordered, that, in the meantime, all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated April 6th, 1891. W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO.—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to Helen A. Grant, Allen D. Grant, Edward N. Grant, Catherine Matzen, Mary M. Miller, John Doe, and Richard Roe, greeting.

You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the county of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 29th day of January, 1891, in which action EDWARD DIETERLE is plaintiff and you are defendants.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: The said action is brought for the purpose of quieting the title to that certain piece or parcel of land situated, lying and being in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, and State of California, and described according to the plan of said city, as the south twenty (20) feet of the west sixty-eight (68) feet of lot number one, in the block bounded by J and K, and 5th and 6th streets; for the purpose, also, of determining all adverse claims of the said defendants to said property; and for a decree of said Court, declaring and adjudging that the title of plaintiff to said premises is good and valid, and that neither the said defendants have, nor any of them has, any estate or interest in the same; and forever enjoining and debarring the said defendants, and each of them, from asserting any claim to said land adverse to plaintiff, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made.

And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL.] and affix the seal of said Court this 20th day of February, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.

Showers of Blood.

Showers of blood from the sky are very rare in this day and age of the world, a fact which makes their comparatively common occurrence in the olden times only that much more extraordinary and unaccountable. In the "Annals of Remarkable Happenings in Rome," mention is made of fourteen different showers of blood and other substances mixed between the years 319 A. D. and 1170. Besides these there were two "showers of much intensity, of which the liquid resembled pure blood and was not intermixed with other matter as heretofore reported." In 1222 we find record of a shower of blood and dust over the larger part of Italy. In 1226 snow fell in Syria, "which presently turned into large pools of gore."

A monk who wrote in 1251 tells of a three days' shower of blood all over southern Europe. In the same year a loaf freshly taken from the oven "did bleed like a new wound" when sliced at the table. In 1348 the great chasms made by the earthquake at Villach, Austria, "sent forth blood and a great pestilence followed." Burgundy had a bloody shower in 1361, and Dedfordshire, England, witnessed the same phenomenon in 1450. In 1656 hailstones fell in Wurtemberg which contained hollow cavities filled with blood. The last bloody shower on record occurred in Siam in 1802.

Something About Bells.

The ringing of bells may be divided into two classes, chiming and peal ringing. Chiming, or the playing of tunes on bells, is the principal method employed on the European continent, and the finest set of bells for this purpose is that in the tower of Les Halles, at Bruges, forty-eight in number. The greatest number of bells of this kind in any one place is that in the cathedral of Antwerp, where there are ninety-nine bells, on which the most elaborate music is played every half hour. Peal ringing is almost unknown on the continent of Europe, and the best bells for the purpose are to be found in England, the twelve bells of Christ church Oxford, being generally admitted to be the finest existing in point of tone. The largest peal is that of St. Paul's, the tenor of which weighs sixty-four hundred weight or 7,168 pounds. To ring a peal is to ring 5,040 changes, for which seven bells are required; twelve bells give 479,001,600 changes. These, it was calculated by Southey, who was fond of such curiosities, would take ninety-one years to ring at the rate of two strokes a second, or ten rounds to the minute. The changes upon fourteen bells, he said, could not be rung through, at the same rate, in less than 16,575 years, and upon four and twenty bells they would require more than 117,000 billions of years.

The Oldest Newspapers.

The oldest newspaper in the whole wide world's Ling-Pau, or Capital Sheet, published in Peking. It first appeared A. D. 911, but came out only at irregular intervals. Since the year 1351, however, it has been published weekly and of uniform size. Now it appears in three editions daily. The first, issued early in the morning and printed on yellow paper, is called Hsing-Pau (business sheet), and contains trade prices and all manner of commercial intelligence. The second edition, which comes out during the forenoon, also printed upon yellow paper, is devoted to official announcements and general news. The third edition appears late in the afternoon, is printed on red paper, and bears the name of Tian-Pau (country sheet). It consists of extracts from the earlier editions, and is largely subscribed for in the provinces. The number of copies printed daily varies between 13,000 and 14,000.

Fair Play in Journalism.

In Mr. Dana's interesting personal reminiscences of Horace Greeley, at the celebration of the Tribune anniversary, he cited the following professional code adopted by the great editor in the conduct of his journal:

Always give a hearing to your opponents. Never attack a man and refuse to let him answer in the same column.

Be always as considerate of the weak and friendless as of the powerful.

Waste no strength in advocating that which is intrinsically impossible.

Never compromise your own opinions on account of your subscribers or advertisers. If they don't like your ideas they can always go to another shop.

These rules are a compend of fair play. A journal conducted on these lines by men of conscience and ability can hardly fail of popular support and respect.

The Rev. Robert Collyer tells an amusing story of a trained troupe of monkeys he once saw in London on a stage. They had been drilled carefully to go through a series of military exercises in uniform, and were making a fine display of their attainments, when a man in the gallery threw a handful of nuts on the stage, and the monkey soldiery at once broke ranks, threw down their guns and scrambled for the hard-shelled dainties.

Municipally speaking, that man is a benefactor to the human race who makes one grain of dust blow where two blew before.

W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

It would be worth knowing to learn just exactly what is the opinion of each individual living in Sacramento as to the city's future prospect and destination; to obtain from each man and woman an expression of what we are to become; whether we are to grow in population and extend the limits of municipal corporation or, on the contrary, are we destined for a time to hold our own, doing neither more nor less for ourselves than we have done in the past, struggle along from hand to mouth yet a few years longer, depend on extraneous circumstances for our living, like the presence of the machine shops, the Legislature every two years and the State Fair every fall, then having outlived our usefulness as a city go into the condition of an ilium fuit, after the few who have enriched themselves from the proceeds of the periodical booms will have sought other fields of enterprise in which to enjoy their wealth made here, like others who have set the example. In a word, is there any permanent future, of a wholesome beneficial character, for our city? The question is and has been an oft-repeated one, and yet the riddle is unsolved and apparently destined to remain so till some unknown Daniel may come to judgment and interpret our destination. But what is the cause of this inertness on the part of the community? Why is it that the city left alone on her own resources—left, for example, without the monthly aid of the railroad shops—would stagger under the weight of her own incompetency and descend into the grade of a village town? Certainly there must be a reason; but what is it? As a natural site for a prosperous, thriving and successful city, she has no superior on the coast. Situated in the richest agricultural valley in the world, from whence are annually sent forth to enrich and benefit the world, millions of dollars' worth of grain and gold, fruits and wine, and all else that enters into the commerce of all countries; with a climate unsurpassed anywhere on earth, we are blessed beyond other communities.

Yet Sacramento ever remains at a standstill patiently waiting the coming of some Moses to lead her out of the bondage of her unprosperous condition. Is the fault not to be found in the people themselves? It would seem so. Will those spasmodic booms in outside real estate that now and again startle the eye have the effect of building the city or attracting residents to it? Let recent experiments in that direction answer. With the exception of an odd residence here and there, the saw and the hammer are not heard; but for a couple of flour mills, contemporaneous almost with the city itself, the wheels of commerce are silent; manufactories of all kinds are unknown; we send abroad for all things we use and not a skilled hand, except in the ordinary way to be found in any village, is to be seen in the city. Then what is it that is wanted in Sacramento to give it the name of a city worthy of the title? Factories, factories, factories. Places where the raw material of the State may be turned into shape for the use of the consumer, and can be had at our doors without being obliged to go a distance to purchase. But of course capital must be invested and while there is plenty of capital among our people, they are apparently afraid to invest it, as they may not realize a return from it for two or three years, and, generally speaking, capitalists must see an immediate income from their outlay, and as factories require time in which to return a profit, the ordinary money owner will have nothing to do with such investments. So it would seem there is no future for Sacramento. Outsiders cannot be expected to come here and invest, where the resident himself fears to risk his money.

Every good American citizen should be a politician, not, however, in the sense that such term is commonly understood. The masses seem to associate the term politician with something unsavory—tricky. The broad view that should be applied to American citizenship includes a knowledge of the political affairs of this country. Partisanship is necessarily an element of the politician. It is the application of the term politician to the ward striker, that brings it into disrepute. A man versed in the politics of the country is a statesman. Hon. J. S. Clarkson has a well-timed and appropriate article in the North American Review, on the subject of "Politicians and the Pharisee," which it would be instructive for all to read and digest. It is the duty of every citizen to take an active part in governmental affairs, and the selection of officers of the government, whether national, State or municipal, is the highest prerogative of the American. When we hear a man say that he takes no interest in politics, we at once say to him that he is not a good citizen. It is through just such men that a few individuals are enabled to seize upon the public affairs and name improper men for official preferment. In all local affairs, there must always be somebody to take the lead and to act. In political matters, when some enterprising citizen takes such lead, there are fault-finders, who hold back and sneer at the action, applying the term "bossism" to the result. Mr. Clarkson hits the nail on the head in these remarks:

By what right does the Pharisee sneer at the politician? By what right does the professional moralist sneer at politics? The hundred years or more of American politics and government is disproof of the sneers of both. The business affairs of the people have been conducted more scrupulously and more accurately than the private business of commerce in the same time. There have been fewer defalcations and fewer rascalities in office, in proportion, than in private life. Who are the politicians who have made money and fortune trafficking in the public name or national honor? Of the six thousand seats that have been filled in Congress in the last thirty years, who are the politicians who have proved dishonest? Is it not true that, where one public official has been found unworthy, twenty men in public life have served the government for a third of the return which they could have gained in the business world or the professions?

There are men who would consider it dishonest to pilfer anything from a neighbor, but who at a reception or banquet do not hesitate from filling their pockets with cigars, often taking bottles of wine. Generally these are men in good financial circumstances. One of the most noticeable examples of small pilfering has been developed by the model reform Legislature of Minnesota. The Farmers' Alliance with the Democratic combine captured the Legislature of that State. Great financial reforms were promised, and the horny-handed son of toil would give the State such an example in economy that would make the old parties feel ashamed. Well, we think this august body of farmers has done just that thing, and from the Minneapolis Tribune we take the following:

It is evident that the people made a mistake in supposing that the men they elected were reformers simply because they claimed to be. An ostentation of superior virtue and purity in politics, as in religion, is almost a sure sign of hypocrisy and insincerity. We hope the farmers of Minnesota will examine the pockets of their Alliance representatives on their return home. If they do they will find them filled with shears, pocket knives, towels, pitchers, tumblers, postage stamps, and almost every conceivable article, bought by the State and carried off by these reformers. It is enough to make the man in the moon hold his nose in disgust.

The horny-handed son of toil has evidently a very hard and elastic conscience—and a capacious pocket.

Truth never seeks concealment; she prefers an open field, a fair fight. She throws up no breastwork, nor fires in ambush. She is aggressive, too. If invaded, she is ready to defend; if not, she seeks her foe and is ready to follow him through all his labyrinths, giving him no rest, no armistice, no promise of quarter, till in the course of ages, she comes off acknowledged victor and claims a triumph. She repudiates the sword, because her impersonation, or rather, her incarnate representative has said, "all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword." Rocks and dungeons, and all the enginery of death, are none of them of her contriving. She goes forth with simple words, ready pens, and fearless presses, and bids defiance to all her foes. She agitates, agitates, agitates, and chooses her apostles sometimes from the ranks of learned, and honorable, often the bench of the carpenter, the field, the fishing boat. They go forth sometimes into the halls of legislation, the pulpit, the college; more often into the humble cottage or by the wayside, and there give utterance to the mighty thought that struggles within them; and as it comes from the heart it reaches the heart—converts are made and multiplied. There, error becomes alarmed. Feeling its meekness it resorts to violence and the living ambassador for truth is crucified. But error gains nothing by this. An earnest word goes forth; it has fallen on a congenial soil, and is sure to spring up and flourish. Words are intangible; thoughts cannot be taken by officers with their writs of civil or criminal process, confined in dungeons, or burnt at the stake. The man who gives voice to words, who stands upon the shore of Time's great ocean and tosses his thoughts, making a dash in its stagnant water, agitating its putrifying surface, may be taken and executed, but the pebble he cast into the mighty water has done its work. "A circle straight succeeds and still another," till its remotest shore has felt the gentle undulation of a wave that originated with the thought of a martyr long since perished from the earth. Error may subsidize priests and politicians—may send them to legislative halls or the sanctuary of their God, and they may cry out to the troubled waters to be still, but the priests of Baal, who cried from morn till eve, "O, Baal, hear us!" were as likely to see their God assume a listening attitude as the priests of Error to witness obedience to their command.

When we speak of life as short we do so relatively to eternity. Life is long. The other animals of the earth do not generally attain to one-half, or even one-quarter, of our years. Even the trees of the forest—some of them—grow up, bear fruit, cast their seed, decay and pass to the earth, while the hand that planted them still remains to plant again. New York, one of the largest cities, along whose streets you may ride for miles, was a village, and the State a wilderness, within the remembrance of those still on earth. Where Cincinnati now stands not a tree was then missing from the primeval forest, and not a log cabin was erected where now are several millions inhabiting Ohio. This is true of all, or nearly all, of the immense vale of the Mississippi, where since empire after empire has arisen. All of this great congregation of empires was beyond the mountains, and that all was a few feeble colonies of Great Britain, over one-half of which was a wilderness. Nations which were then in existence, have since passed away. In the meantime France has been an absolute monarchy, a republic, an empire, an absolute monarchy, a limited monarchy, and again a republic. Thus nations and empires have arisen and passed away; indeed, if any one will mark the state of nations and communities, and of human opinions and principles in the days of our Revolution, and observe what changes have since occurred in all these things, he may then be convinced that the life of man is long. Yet life is short. The patriarch had lived 130 years, still he said, "Few and evil have been my days." When compared to eternity life is but a vapor, which appears on the mountain side in the morning, but vanishes and is seen no more at the coming of the sun. We are told that some stars mentioned in ancient catalogues are not now seen, while we know that new ones have taken a position in the sky. God, once in one or five centuries, winds up the career of one world and calls a new one into existence. Numerous as the pearly drops that hang on the grass and flowers of our prairies in a summer's morning, and coming to take their places, one by one, in a hundred or five hundred years, what arithmetic can tell the time when the first of them threw its light over the darkness of chaos? Whoever had lived to see the Assyrian empire arise, and the long period of its decay, and lived while the Persian, the Greek and the Roman swayed the world; lived, too, through the sleep of the dark ages, and were now among us to tell the story of Noah, of Methuselah and of Adam's life; he, indeed, would be a very aged man. In the light of his years, ours are but a winter's day. But there are angels, not yet in their prime of strength, who sung at the birth of the daughters of night, and who have renewed their songs as each fresh one has added her light to the evening splendors of heaven. Six thousand years to theirs is nothing, and three score and ten are but a flash from the summer's cloud. Yet with the Creator of the Universe these aged spirits are but infants, and the time is yet to come with each one of us when the length of their existence and ours will be apparently the same. O, what is time, and what our short life! Fleeting as the breath we draw, and passing as a dream or tale that is told, and which we can never again recall.

From what we have seen of the shortness of time and the length of eternity, it would seem that these things properly considered would lead us to apply our hearts to wisdom. What is wisdom? This is a somewhat extended term. The man who does what on the whole, and under the circumstances is best, is wise, and his actions are called those of wisdom. So he who possesses that knowledge and inclination both enabling and leading him to do, when there may be a call for it, what is really for the best good, is said to possess wisdom. The young man, aware that old age is sure to, and that sickness and misfortune may come, and properly husbanding his time and resources, laying up in store for these certainties and contingencies, is wise. The mariner or traveler who sets out on a long voyage or journey, where dangers by sea and perils from robbers and wild beasts by land are sure to meet him, and who lays in a sufficient supply of provisions, and provides ample securities and means of defence, is wise. And it may be remarked, the longer the journey, and the greater the uncertainty of what may be the nature of the seas over which he is to sail, or the countries through which the traveler is to pass, and the perils to be encountered, the more intense his solicitude and the more incessant his labors that every precaution be taken. Yet there are those who when merely a lake is to be crossed, do not take into consideration that they may be detained by winds under the lee of some barren island. Vast numbers are now in the almshouse feeding on the bread of those who have acted with more wisdom—numbers that wasted the vigor and earnings of youth in trifles and wantonness.

Life is short; and some of you may say, can it be possible that God would connect such tremendous issues as eternal weal or woe with the decision and conduct of a period so brief? The commencement of things is generally small, and in vast disproportion to the magnitude of consequences. In human affairs how often does it occur that fortunes are made or lost, the happiness of a long life, even life itself, is secured or thrown away by the determination of a simple moment. In nature, in history and everywhere, God affords abundant lessons that small things are followed by vast results. A few drops of water, a little streamlet, begins the mighty river which dashes in thunder and foam down the mountain side, rolls for thousands of miles through nations, building on its banks a hundred cities, bearing on its bosom the golden stream of commerce and blessing through all time millions of the earth. So with those great empires which have mainly determined the destiny of nations. Soon after the deluge a mighty hunter built a small village and began the trade of war and robbery. This little village became the great Babylon; and for over a thousand years her brazen gates poured forth her armies—a stream of fire to make the most distant nations tremble, to consume fields of grain and the fruits of industry, to burn hamlets, villages and cities, and reduce nations to bondage, and to drag in chains their sons and daughters to be sold as slaves. Remulus threw a low mud wall over which a man could leap, around a few huts of sticks and mud. This was a refuge for a band of robbers. But mark the result; villages, cities, nations, in turn, fell before this band. The Roman Eagle arising gradually in its might, spread for fifteen hundred years its wings of terror and subjugation from the regions of eternal frost to those of the torrid zone. So, too, a few blows from the club of Cain, Abel was dead, and murder had begun. But had the earth ever refused to drink up, or did the voice of murdered blood still cry from its bosom, the earth would now be a sea of gore and every clod on which we tread would cry out beneath our feet. The beginning of sin must have been in one thought, one action. Eve put forth the hand, plucked and ate, and the train was laid whence followed all of earth's woes. Call up millions which all over the wide earth sleep in death, and you may learn the great truth; things infinite follow things finite; that things vast, far beyond limited comprehension, are determined and set in motion in a short space of time.

PIONEER MINING.

The pen pictures of pioneer mining in California, in the May Century, by E. G. Waite, are realistic, and readily recognized by old "49ers." It is true that the people who formed a part of those scenes are rapidly passing away. Rarely now have we any evidences remaining of the methods of extracting gold from the earth in vogue in the early days of mining. The "rocker" and "long tom" have long since "gone glimmering through the dreams of things that were." The "sluice boxes" are still one of the chief means of separating the gold from mother earth, but on a much larger scale than those used in primitive days. We can recollect the times, when only a youngster, that we used to "gouge" the crevices and seams in the "bed rock" and wash out the products thereof in pan or rocker, and the results of which, were they produced these days, would be startling. It was no uncommon occurrence, after a freshet, to go along the banks of a stream where the surface earth had been washed away leaving the "bed rock" bare, to pick out hundreds of dollars in gold from the crevices and seams. While all these cherished memories remain, and the old style of mining is extinct, there are immensely rich deposits of gold, only deeper in the bowels of the earth, in El Dorado, Placer, Nevada, Calaveras and Amador. Indeed, the extent of these deposits is beyond calculation. It only requires more labor and capital to reveal this vast wealth. Mr. Waite closes his interesting article with the following piece of sentiment: "The old miner, full of cherished memories of that wonderful past, on revisiting the scenes of his early labors sees no winding line of miners by the river marge, with their rattling rockers or long toms; no smoke from campfire or chimney arises from the depths of gorges; cabins are gone; no laughter or cheery voice comes up from the cañons; no ounce a day is dried by the supper fire. Gone are most of the oaks and pines from the mountain sides; the beds of the rivers are covered deep with the accumulated debris of years, over which the water, once clear and cold from the melting snows of the Sierra, goes sluggishly, laden with mud, in serpentine windings from bank to bank. On the tableland above, in the chasms made by hydraulic power in the pleiocene drift, the hollow columns of iron that once compressed the water stand rusting away; the monitors lie dismantled like artillery in a captured fortress. All is silence and desolation where once was the roar of water and the noise of busy life. The same red and brown soil is beneath your feet, the same alternation of ridges and gorges is here, the same skies unflecked by clouds from May to November are overhead; the same pure air is left to breathe in spite of courts and monopolies; a considerable portion of the soil is cultivated; scattered here and there over the mountain slopes are homes surrounded with flowers and fruits—but the early miner sees it all with the sad belief that the glory is gone. The early miner has never been truly painted. I protest against the flip-pant style and eccentric rhetoric of those writers who have made him a terror, or who, seizing upon a sporadic case of extreme oddity, some drunken, brawling wretch, have given a caricature to the world as the typical miner. The so-called literature that treats of the golden era is too extravagant in this direction. In all my personal experience in mining camps from 1849 to 1854 there was not a case of bloodshed, robbery, theft or actual violence. I doubt if a more orderly society was ever known. How could it be otherwise? The pioneers were young, ardent, uncorrupted, most of them well educated and from the best families in the East. The early miner was ambitious, energetic and enterprising. No undertaking was too great to daunt him. The pluck and resources exhibited by him in attempting mighty projects with nothing but courage and his brawny arms to carry them out was phenomenal. His generosity was profuse and his sympathy active, knowing no distinction of race. His sentiment that justice is sacred was never dulled. His services were at command to settle differences peaceably, or with pistol in hand to right a grievous wrong to a stranger. His capacity for self-government never has been surpassed. Of a glorious epoch, he was of a glorious race."

The Human Brain.

Our conscious ego covers a very narrow space. Only one or two, and certainly no more than a few ideas, can at one and the same time be accompanied with consciousness. How poor we would be if our mental existences were limited to that. Happily, we can constantly derive new vigor and recreation from the spheres of our unconscious soul-life.

Could we look into the interior of a human brain, and did we understand all the many vibrations and motions of the nerve-substance, we would undoubtedly be struck with the quantity of unconscious work that is being carried on there all the time. We should observe how many millions of memories (every one of them having a special structure of its own) are constantly nourished by the oxygen-freighted corpuscles of the blood which surround them in the delicate capillaries.

The places where the different kinds of memories are located do not form, as has been supposed, distinct provinces separated by definite boundaries. They are promiscuously distributed, yet there are corners where memories of the same kind are thickly crowded. In the parietal circumvolutions of the cortex, round about the fissure Rolando, we see the movements of our limbs in their most complicated combinations. Below the fissure of Sylvius are images of sound. There are all the old nursery rhymes, college songs, sonatas and operas that have delighted us. Near by are the words of our mother tongue. They live deep in the folds of the fissure Sylvius, in the third frontal circumvolution and are largely dispersed over the sphenoidal lobe. All the verses of our childhood, of which we had not thought for years and years, are there still preserved. The front corner of the sphenoidal lobe is the seat of smell, perfumes and odors—disagreeable and pleasant. The hind part of the cortex in the occipital lobe is full of images, it glows with colored pictures of all kinds. There are the dear old faces of our friends, there are landscapes and all manner of instantaneous photographs of former sights and experiences. In the three frontal circumvolutions those thoughts are throbbing that are of a more abstract order. There are philosophical reflections and mathematical problems. Now and then one or the other idea looms out like a memorial of a national victory more powerfully than the rest. They are the memories of successful thoughts, of happy solutions of difficult problems. What an astounding throng of different structures, and all alive and consisting of feeling nerve-substance!

This is the physiological aspect of the brain. Psychologically considered, our mind is an immense empire of innumerable spirits that live together in the narrow space of about a quarter of a cubic foot. Spirits they are, because they are psychical existences; they are framed by the memories of organized substance. Yet at the same time they are material realities; they are living forms of bodily presence, sustained by the nourishing currents of the blood.

This vast spiritual empire in the human brain is excellently provided for with highways and by-ways for intercommunication. The communications are called by physiologists commissural fibers, by psychologists associations. If it so happens that in the state of unconscious activity a certain number of ideas associate, and then if they have formed a unity (the solution of a problem, a discovery, an invention or a poem), their life becomes more excited so that they can make themselves felt. They are ushered into our consciousness like an inspiration from heaven. Is it to be wondered at that the poet, the artist, the prophet are under the impression that they are instruments merely in the hands of a Greater One than themselves? They feel influenced by a foreign and a supernatural power, over which they have no control. And this is true in a certain sense. As the limbs and the whole body of a child grow without the assistance of his consciousness, or as plants germinate and blow and bring seed, so the thoughts of a man in the shape of delicate brain-structures which are the organs of his feeling and thinking, grow and develop even in spite of him, even if he should attempt to oppose their development. It is not we who make our thoughts think, but our thoughts are thinking, and their thinking is sometimes accompanied with consciousness. Therefore, we should say, as Lichenberg proposes, "it thinks," just as we say: "it lightens," or "it rains."

Experimental psychology has furnished us with many new data of abnormal soul-life through pathological observations and hypnotic experiments. How odd and incredible, indeed, at first sight almost impossible, do these recent acquisitions of psychological research appear. And yet they find their parallels in well-known and common facts of mental activity—in facts that every one can verify by his own experience. If the facts are but clearly stated in their parallelism, what a flood of light do they shed upon all the problems of abnormal soul-life.—Dr. Paul Carus, in The Soul of Man.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Sara Bernhardt will give one of her great personations in Sacramento next September upon her return from Australia.

An intelligent public verdict is more significant and more reliable in matters of dramatic art than an individual critical opinion. It is that sort of public verdict that is to be desired.

A Western would-be tragedian told a reporter the other day that he was going on a starring tour, and the next day the paper had it "starving tour." And yet we wonder at crime.

Many people wonder why Mr. and Mrs. Kendal are never to be seen acting unless in each other's company. The reason is that when they married they made a vow never to be parted when playing—a vow they have kept to this day, with what happy results everybody knows.

Barry Sullivan died in London, May 4th. He was the greatest "Richard" that ever trod the boards. We saw him a dozen years ago in this great character, and assert there has never been his equal. Of late years Barry Sullivan has been little known on the stage this side the continent.

The Baroness Burdett-Coutts is well known everywhere by her gifts to philanthropic and charitable objects, but the report is not so widely circulated in America as in England that it was she who advanced to Henry Irving the funds that enabled him to become manager of the Lyceum. The Baroness has always had a penchant for "the profession," probably from the fact that her aunt, the Duchess of St. Albans and the widow of Sir Thomas Coutts, from whom the Baroness inherited her fortune, was in her youth the actress Harriet Mellon. She is now 77 years of age, and was made a Baroness in her own right by the Queen about twenty years ago.

The County Fair will be given to-morrow evening at the Metropolitan. The play depicts New England life and genuine "down-east" character. "Otis Tucker" is a study. "Solomon Hammerhead," the "cute" and tricky fellow, who thinks he can rule the neighborhood, is a live character. "Abigail True" stands out as the real Yankee maiden manager of farm affairs. "Taggs" and "Tim" are the business of the sketch. The good-night song by "Abigail," "Sally" and "Taggs," accompanied by a wheezy old melodeon, is realistic in the extreme. The trained horse, "Cold Molasses," comes in for his share of praise, both as an actor and the winner of the County Fair purse, which enables "Abigail" to pay her obligation to "Hammerhead," the villain of the piece. The husking bee is fine and recalls early New England times. The climax is the race. It is so natural that one imagines himself on the real track. The mechanical effect has never been equalled. It is a singular circumstance that the management should select Sunday night for the performance.

Nym Crinkle, speaking of pretty faces and their recollections, says: "Looking at the pretty faces that drifted about there were some phantom recollections awakened. Whom did Hattie Delaro Barnes remind me of? Was not that sylph that kept the galleries applauding a daughter of one of the famous Worrell sisters? Could not one see bits of the mother in the shake of her trim ankle and hear it in the contralto voice? How long is it since the Worrell sisters were charming the country?" Following the gifted dramatic reviewer further, he gives expression to this idea of recent farce-comedy. "For some time there has been a growing opinion among the more enterprising of the amusement caterers that the public prefers farce-comedy to any other form of entertainment. This opinion is based upon receipts, no doubt. Some of the farce-comedy combinations have made fortunes while traveling over the wreck-strewn paths of the melodramas. There is, too, a growing tendency to pad out even the serious plays with farce-comedy specialties. Every one must have been struck by the prevalence of the skirt dance and the quartet. They pop up in the middle of the gravest stories; the sentimental and the idyllic drama stop while they usurp the stage."

Book Chat.

"Was it Love?" by Paul Bourget.—In this, his latest though not his best novel, Bourget studies a woman who, while bound by sacred ties to one man, loves another, and whose indecision and the pity she feels for the man she once loved make her defer from day to day the decisive step. She seems to be ignorant of the fact that ruptures are always hard and cruel, and that pity for the discarded love nearly always embitters the early joys of a later passion. She begins a system of deceptions, of compromises with her own conscience, until the inevitable occurs.

"What is poetry? Is it a true thing?" questions Audry, the innocent milkmaid, of the garrulous Touchstone. Poetry is the crystallization of the best spiritual thought of each succeeding generation—and hence, in the highest sense, is the epitome, the beginning, middle and end, of all truth. By its aid the gift of prophesy becomes perennial. Through its magic agency alone the race recognizes the kinship of every generation of mankind "since the morning stars sang together." By its potent spell Ulysses and Ajax shake hands with Napoleon and Washington; and manly courage, patience, endurance, constancy and patriotism are known to be abiding virtues. Through the aerial reverberations—low and sweet—of its plaintive song the burdens of the past are swallowed up in the glories of the future, and looking through the cataclysms of yesterday, and the fierce storms of to-day are to be discovered the splendors of the rising sun of eternity.

The earliest mention of writing in the Bible is in Exodus, 17th chap., verse 14. It reads thus: "And the Lord said unto Moses, Write this for a memorial in a book, and rehearse it in the ears of Joshua." The reference is to the battle between Israel and the Amalekites. This was about 1,500 years before the Christian era. The fact is mentioned in such a way as to indicate that writing was at that time well known and practiced. In the time of Jeremiah, about 600 B. C., mention is made of the roll. It is very probable that the roll was the development of a still earlier and simpler form of manuscript. Various kinds of materials were used for these early writings. The Assyrians wrote on bricks before they were baked. The Egyptians wrote on clay vessels, as the potters' herds that are excavated show. Wax was another material. This wax was spread upon wood, and formed a tablet. Two or three of these tablets were hinged or fastened together, and formed a codex. The word codex is now applied to a manuscript. Tablets came into extensive use and were employed in the Middle Ages.

Professional Chat.

A burst of eloquence is a consequence of mental dynamite.

When a lawyer pays court to his aspirations, there might be a strong suspicion of judicial bribery.

O'Connell used to tell the story of the court officer, who, wishing to thin the court, called out: "All ye blackguards that isn't lawyers, quit the court."

Judge Gresham not infrequently rides on the front platform of a Chicago street car; and at least one driver has admitted that the Justice knows vastly more about horses than he does.

A story is told of Dr. Crosby which that gentleman used to relate himself. His house was once entered by a burglar whom the doctor himself captured and who was sentenced to twelve years' imprisonment. But for three years the minister kept up a correspondence with the convict, converted him, secured his pardon, and later had the satisfaction of seeing him become a prominent and respected citizen in a distant town, and blessed with a wife and child.

Psychology is a study too much neglected; it is indispensable for every one who has to deal with people; and who has not? The physician, the clergyman, the employer of labor, the officer in the army, the professor, the merchant, the banker, and almost every one has to deal with people, and above all, the lawyer. Self-knowledge is not sufficient to make us free, it must be self-knowledge and the knowledge of other people; it must be self-knowledge in the broadest sense, knowledge of the soul, of the motives that work upon and can be employed to affect man's sentiments. It is only knowledge that can make us free; and knowledge will make us free. And because it makes us free, knowledge, and chiefly so psychological knowledge, is power.

A well known Massachusetts judge, when at the bar, once obtained the acquittal of a client charged with selling liquor on Sunday, by the following address to the jury: "Gentlemen of the jury, you have heard the evidence that my client had a pint bottle full of whisky, from which he sold a drink at eleven o'clock on Sunday morning; at eleven o'clock Sunday morning, gentlemen of the jury, a bottle full of whisky, which he must have purchased overnight and had in his possession until eleven o'clock in the morning. Now, gentlemen of the jury, look at my client; there he sits. Can you say on your oaths that such a poor, miserable, ragged, besotted, low-down devil as that could keep a bottle full of whisky from midnight Saturday until eleven o'clock Sunday morning?"

The Washington correspondent of the Boston Gazette says that during the session of the Methodist Conference one of the ministers went into a drugstore about dusk on a chilly evening and asked the proprietor for a good, mild cigar. After paying for it he added: "Is there any place around your store where I can have a quiet smoke? Our Bishop has just been preaching pretty sharply against the use of tobacco, so I don't want to smoke 'round the house where I am staying, nor out on the street, on account of the bad example I might set. But a mild cigar does rest one so!" The druggist quite agreed with him, and said: "Step behind my prescription counter, sir; you will be unseen there." Two minutes later another good minister came into the store, bought a mild cigar, and asked if he might be permitted to smoke in the store, because: "Our Bishop has just been preaching against smoking," he explained, almost in the exact words of his predecessor. He also was sent behind the prescription counter. The screen hid the two dominees from sight, but it did not shut out the peals of laughter which arose when minister No. 2 encountered minister No. 1.

Girls.

Girls is grate on making believe. She will make believe a doll is a live baby. She will make believe she is orful sweet on another girl or a feller if they come to see her, and when they are gone she will say, "Horrid old thing!"

If yer don't do what a girl tells yer, she says you're horrid. I drather be horrid than be soft. If you do what a girl tells you, you will do all sorts of foolish things.

Girls can be good in school every day if they feel like it. I shud think they would git tired, and have to do sumthing wonsen in a while; I know a feller does. Girls say fellers act orful, but when a girl gets a-going it she acts orfuler than any feller durst. They don't care for nothing.

If a girl wants a feller to carry her books home, she ain't satisfied unless she gits the same feller the other girls want, whether she likes him or not.

Girls is grate on having secrets—I mean, telling secrets. They make a secret out of nothing at all, and tell it around to all the other girls, orful quiet, just as if it was sumthing dredful. I bleeve a girl likes to make bleeve they are doing sumthing dredful.

Girls always gits their joggorfry lessons better than a feller; but if they are going anywhere they don't know their way a bit, and they are sure to git lost.

If a girl don't feel like doing a thing, you can't make her, no matter whether she had orter or not. If she won't, she won't, and she will git out of it somehow. That is all I know about girls this time.

The Laugh was Raised.

Wiggins was harrassed by the possession of expensive tastes and the non-possession of means to gratify them—a combination of circumstances which, being known, made it extremely difficult for him to negotiate even a $5 loan from his associates about town. Parkin, in particular, used to congratulate himself on the fact that Wiggins had never been in his books for ever so small an amount, and steadfastly proposed that he never would be. Unfortunately for Parkin, however, he was fond of a practical joke, and it was this fact that interfered with the success of his prudent determination.

A number of them were sitting in the club reading-room one day, when Wiggins whispered to Parkin—"Let me have a tenner for a few minutes, till I put up a joke on one of the fellows."

Parkin, ready for some fun, and suspecting nothing, handed him a $10 note, and was surprised a few moments afterward to see Wiggins using it to pay his club dues.

"I say, Wiggins," he cried, in amazement, "I thought you were going to raise a laugh on one of the fellows with that $10 note?"

"So I am," explained Wiggins; "you are the fellow."—Harper's.

In national debt payment England is going only about two-thirds as fast as the United States, but the fact that it is paying its debt as rapidly as this, or paying it at all, is very creditable to that country. Exclusive of the United States, Great Britain is the only leading nation which is reducing the bulk of its monetary obligations.

The death of Mme. Blavatsky removes the principal disciple of theosophy. She was a remarkable woman, and evidently had some deep thinkers as advisers. Her writings, such as "Isis Unveiled," have the earmarks of other thinkers as well as the results of her own thoughts. In some respects we think the tenets of theosophy will not experience any impairment by the demise of Mme. Blavatsky.

The drama should be poetry in action—poetry reflected from the retina, caught by the delicate nerves of the ear and conveyed to the soul through the nerve-telegraph of the body. The use of the drama is to give spiritual life, verging ever closer and closer toward spiritual immortality. Its abuse is to cultivate the crude, coarse, animal instincts of the man—to build for the earth—of the earth, earthy.

It was an entirely appropriate display of emotion, when Gen. John Bidwell and Captain E. D. Shirland could not repress the liberal flow of tears, at the beautiful sentiments expressed by President Harrison regarding the Pioneers of California. The full application of the sentiments evidently touched the hearts of these veteran pioneers of 1841 and 1846. Our President is a gifted orator, embracing all the elements that go to make an orator—occasion, surroundings and manner.

Marriage, aside from the romance of youth, is a serious business. It should be entered on, as is any other business, only after careful forethought; and, whenever possible, with an ample supply of the assets which it calls for. Money is not all. There should also be health, mutual consideration, forbearance for each other's foibles, and such other qualities as are needed in any harmonious partnership. The marriage bond that is thus hedged about is rarely sundered in a divorce court.

"He wrote this under his own signature" is a phrase not infrequently seen or heard. Do those who use it ever stop to think what sort of idea the words themselves convey? Are men in the habit of placing their signatures at the beginning of any piece of writing that they undertake? The thing is essentially absurd, and hardly less so is the kindred phrase, "over his own signature." This implies that the writer wrote the signature first and then laboriously proceeded to write the letter, or the article, or whatever it may be, over the signature. Two excellent phrases to avoid, these.

According to the census bulletin of April 20, 1891, relating to educational statistics, the per cent. of gain in public school enrollment between 1880 and 1890, in California, is 37.33. The per cent. of gain in population for the same period is 39.72. The statistics of New Mexico show the greatest gain in public school enrollment, the per cent. gain being 283.07, while the per cent. gain in population for the decade has only been 28.46. In 1880 the population of New Mexico was 119,565. In 1890 it is 153,593. There was enrolled in the public schools in 1880, 4,755, while the returns for 1890 show 18,215; making the per cent. increase 283.07.

The Board of Supervisors of this county are up in arms against the very large gas bills incurred in and about the Court house. It seems that notwithstanding the fact that a great amount of gas is generated in the Supervisors' rooms, as well as in the departments of the Superior Court, still the account with the "bloated monopoly," the gas company, increases. Now, our intellectual Supervisors should be able to invent some means of utilizing the surplus gas which is generated in and about the county buildings, and thus circumvent the grasping monopolists known as the gas company. It is a pity that so much raw material should be allowed to go to waste, when this grinding autocrat of light is fattening on the process of the development of bottled sunlight. The inventive genius of the Supervisors should at least be equal to their gas creative qualities.

It is rather amusing to note how easily one's opinions may be shaped. A man who has got into the habit of using slang and of pronouncing words incorrectly to amuse either himself or some one else, sometimes repeats the offense when he had no intention of doing so. One of the words which he frequently pronounces incorrectly is "hyperbole," calling it "hyper-bol." In conversation with a woman whom he had just met, he let slip this pronunciation. He saw in an instant what he had done, for her face showed how startled she was by the unusual sound of the word. "Do you know," he said laughingly, "I find that very many people are shocked when they hear 'hyper-bol' pronounced 'hyper-bol.' Now, for instance, how do you pronounce it?" The woman hesitated, almost blushed, and then answered in an apologetic way: "Why, shouldn't one pronounce it 'hy-per-bol'?" "Do you?" said the other like a flash. "Well, yes," she answered slowly, and then added quickly, "but no doubt I am wrong." So much for belief.

We met an old friend the other day, who had been affluent—indeed, one of the wealthy men of the country. Glad to meet him and, not being aware of the reverses of fortune, congratulated him on his fresh appearance. "Well, old fellow, I never allow myself to become despondent," said our friend. "But it has been the shady side with me for several years; I have got to bed-rock, and the vein has petered out." Of course, we understood this to mean that he was broke. We moralized a little, as the most perilous hour of a person's life is when he is tempted to despond. Our friend, though hardy and inclined to look on the bright side of life, was a little despondent. But he braced up under the fact that a man must never lose courage. No matter how poor, how pushed, whether deserted by former friends, how lost to the world, he must keep up his courage, hold up his head. It is the will that makes or unmakes the man. As we knew how it felt to be reduced from affluence, we could but admire our courageous friend as he walked away whistling, "Hard times, come again no more." After all, a man's best help is himself—his own heart and resolute purpose. He must quarry his own nature—tune himself to circumstances, as it were.

Gen. W. H. L. Barnes, father of the infantile District Attorney of San Francisco, and Charles H. Wetmore, a self-ordained connoisseur of wines, are at swords points because the General would not have anything to do with our native brands at the banquet given to President Harrison by the Chamber of Commerce, and over which the elegant Barnes presided. Wetmore threatened to write a book and call it "Mr. Barnes, of San Francisco," but has abandoned the idea without assigning a reason; the most plausible one to those who know Wetmore, being the difficulty of securing the proper person to do the literary part of the work. He contents himself with having himself interviewed by reporters and sneering at Barnes as an ignoramus in etiquette and social matters, and deprecating the fate that permitted the bloodless warrior to control the great "feed," and return a box of samples of wines that was sent for trial. Wetmore is correct in his opinion of Gen. Barnes as a social leader, and if he would write a book on what he does not know about wines, and Barnes wrote another on what he has to learn on the rules governing good society, there would be two very large volumes added to the trash pile of literature; one in fairly good English, the other to be referred to the Second Grammar Class for revision.

The most difficult duty to perform in the social or fashionable world is to receive and to be presented properly to distinguished people, ladies or gentlemen. In the ordinary daily life of refined people a certain degree of politeness should be observed; no lady or gentleman entitled to the distinction of gentility will forget that natural courtesy that is due to each other; when they do forget then they cease to be ladies and gentlemen and become male and female bores. It is to be regretted that the old time fashion of politeness and urbanity that once dominated good society is rapidly dying away, and a freedom and familiarity inconsistent with good breeding is usurping its place. But to return to the original topic. It is seldom in our present day one comes across a man or woman who really understands the duty and obligation attached to the delicate position of one selected to do the honors of presenting visitors who are desirous of paying their respects to some dignitary of the nation. It is an embarrassing and unenviable office, and one calling for special fitness. Only those having peculiar fitness should be detailed to such situation, for if it fall to hands unaccustomed or ignorant of what is required, there must ensue not only fatal embarrassment but ridicule and chagrin. Hence, committees and individuals cannot be too circumspect in preparing, in advance, for the offices assigned them when a visit is expected from some great one of the land, in order that the proprieties of the occasion may be duly observed.

An actor told a story the other evening about a fencing master in London who had two sons. Both of them, like the father, were physical giants. Who was the strongest and best fighter was a disputed question until a burglar got into the house one night. One of the sons, opening the front door with a latch-key late at night, found a robber in the hall. They immediately clinched. The other brother, hearing the noise, rushed down stairs, and not being able in the dark to distinguish a burglar from a worthy and honest citizen of London, proceeded to pound both men whom he ran against. Meanwhile brother No. 1, thinking there were two burglars in the house, turned half of his attention to the new enemy, and the fight became desperate. The father, awakened by the uproar, rushed down stairs with a heavy walking-stick. Then the fight was something to admire, but to avoid. When it was all over and the gas was lighted by the aged fencing master, it was discovered that he had whipped not only the burglar but his two sons. When this story was told an Englishman was one of the party. "Well," he said, "I never before heard of a burglar so reckless as to enter the house of an English fencing master. Served him right."

"You Kissed Me."

[We have seen so many incorrect versions of the following stanzas published recently, that we are forced to print them as they were originally written some years ago. The other day we saw a badly-botched attempt at them published as original in the New York Mail.]

You kissed me! My head had drooped low on your breast,
With a feeling of shelter and infinite rest;
While the holy emotions my tongue dared not speak
Flashed up in a flame from my heart to my cheek.
Your arms held me fast—oh, your arms were so bold!
Heart beat against heart in their passionate fold;
Your glances seemed drawing my soul through my eyes
As the sun draws the mist from the sea to the skies;
Your lips clung to mine, till I prayed in my bliss
They might never unclasp from that rapturous kiss.

You kissed me! My heart and my breath, and my will,
In delirious joy for a moment stood still,
Life had for me, then, no temptations, no charms,
No vista of pleasure outside of your arms;
And were I this instant an angel, possessed
Of the glory and peace that are given the blest,
I would fling my white robes murepinningly down,
And tear from my forehead its beautiful crown,
To nestle once more in that heaven of rest,
With your lips upon mine, and my head on your breast.

You kissed me! My soul in a bliss so divine
Reeled and swooned like a foolish man, drunken with wine;
And I thought 'twere delicious to die then, if death
Would but come while my lips were yet moist with your breath;

'Twere delicious to die, if my heart could grow cold
While your arms clasped me round in their passionate fold;
And these are the questions I ask day and night:
Must my soul taste no more such exquisite delight?
Would you care if your breast were my shelter as then?
And if you were here, would you kiss me again?

A Sketch of Byron.

Mr. Murray, the publisher, in the late "Recollections" gives a reminiscence of Byron, as follows: "I can recollect seeing Lord Byron in Albemarle street. So far as I can remember, he appeared to me rather a short man with a handsome countenance, remarkable for the fine blue veins which ran over his pale, marble temples. He wore many rings on his fingers and a brooch in his shirt-front, which was embroidered. When he called he used to dress in a black dress coat (as we should now call it), with gray and sometimes nankeen trousers, his shirt open at the neck. Lord Byron's deformity in his foot was very evident, especially as he walked down-stairs. He carried a stick. After Scott and he had ended their conversation in the drawing-room, it was a curious sight to see the two greatest poets of the age—both lame—stumping down-stairs side by side. They continued to meet in Albemarle street nearly every day and remained together for two or three hours at a time. Lord Byron dined several times in Albemarle street. On one of these occasions he met Sir John Malcolm—a most agreeable and accomplished man—who was all the more interesting to Lord Byron because of his intimate knowledge of Persia and India. After dinner Sir John observed to Lord Byron how much gratified he had been to meet him and how much surprised he was to find him so full of gaiety and entertaining conversation. Byron replied: 'Perhaps you see me now at my best.' Sometimes, though not often, Lord Byron read passages from his poems to my father. His voice and manner were very impressive. His voice, in the deepest tones, bore some resemblance to that of Mrs. Siddons."

FLASHES.

Repentance is being sorry when it is too late.

Avoid the man or woman who has a good word for no one.

We don't like those people who sneer at women and at marriage.

How is it that we find men of great abilities generally have greater liabilities?

Consistency may be a jewel. A wife may be a jewel, but not always consistent.

When a lover says that his girl dwells in her mind alone, it is time to change her mind.

A chaperon may be necessary for some people who are abroad. A young lady nowadays has a chap her own.

That paragon of humanity who always prides himself on saying just what he thinks, rarely ever thinks enough to say anything of moment.

Open-air Concerts.

The young gentlemen having charge of the open-air concerts for the summer have resolved to hold the concerts at the Capitol Park and Plaza. This is a wise conclusion. While it would be pleasant occasionally to hold concerts at Oak Park, it seems that the proper regulations and protection cannot be afforded the peaceable lovers of music at that place. The untamed hoodlum generally becomes so numerous that quiet people will not take the chances of insult and injury. Our open-air concerts have become a feature of the amusement-loving people of this city. There is nothing more popular than the splendid music wafted on the soft summer breezes. Old and young alike enjoy these evening serenades.

Cleaning Streets.

The chaingang has been recruited, and with full ranks is doing fine service in cleaning up the streets. The full force is now at work on J and K streets removing the accumulated mud. With judicious sprinkling hereafter following this work, we could have much less dust flying at every little breeze. The chaingang could be utilized on some of the back streets.

Scolding.

Our neighbor, the Record-Union, usually of a very mild and forgiving disposition, has indulged itself in a general scolding match. Everybody, from our prime minister Blaine down to Road Overseer, comes in for a scolding for acts of omission as well as commission. Well, a little scold now and then does no harm.

Red Men's Pic-nic.

On Tuesday the several tribes of Red Men will hold their annual pic-nic. This year the festivities will be at Mahon's Grove, near the mouth of the Feather river. Every preparation has been made to make this an enjoyable event. The Red Men never leave anything undone to make their social events successes.

She Forgave the Insult.

"How dared you?"
"I had not read it—I could not know—I—"
"You have no excuse?"
"I had not even cut the leaves!"
"One could perceive from the very first chapter the risqué character of the whole novel—and for a man—for you to lend such a look to me was an insult!"
"An insult!"
"One I shall never forgive!"

Silence obtrudes itself so offensively as to be heard. She sighs impatiently, and from the window looks at the night so full of mischievous twinkling stars. He crosses over slowly to the cosy library table with its seductive litter of magazines and late novels. She taps her foot. Her pretty forehead is angrily puckered.

A look of despair settles upon his anxious face. He watches her, idly toying meanwhile with the offending volume.

His hands mechanically clasp an ivory paper cutter.

"You will never forgive me?"
"I will never forgive you!"

He inserts the knife between the fluttering leaves. A look of relief spreads itself over his face. He grins.

"Never?"
"Never!"

"You must!"
"Must!" (with hauteur).

"The first chapter betrayed the book?"
"It did!" (uneasily).

"Then why—may I ask—do I find all of the leaves cut?" Tableau.

Susan B. Anthony's advice to young girls to study law so that they may be able to conduct their own divorce cases has a big string to it. Men will become skittish about marrying girls "learned in the law" and afraid of wedding pretty charmers who know more about pleas than pies, and are better fitted to state a case than to cook a dinner.

THE END OF THE EARTH.

A Terrible Picture by Camille Flammarion, the Astronomer.

In consequence of the nature of the soil, and because of the scarcity of rain, of snow and of clouds in that region, the great African desert that extends south of the Sahara had remained one of the least cold zones of the globe, and a warm current blowing from that desert on Nubia and Arabia, to return to the equator by Ceylon, had for a long time left a part of Egypt free from the invasion of ice and snow. Following the indicated direction, the last human couple hovered above the regions formerly watered by the Nile, henceforth frozen. They perceived from afar the great pyramid, ruined, but still standing.

The first monument of humanity, this testimony to the antiquity of civilization, was still standing. Its geometric stability had saved it. It was perhaps the only human idea that had attained its end. Created by Cheops to eternally protect his royal mummy, this tomb had survived the revolutions which had destroyed everything else. The last man came to join the first king and shelter himself beneath his shroud.

But the wind of the tempest was blowing again. A fine powdery snow was spreading over the immense desert.

"Let us stop here and rest," said Eva, "since we are condemned to death; and, besides, who has not been? I wish to die in peace in thine own arms."

They looked for a cavity among the ruins and seated themselves beside each other, contemplating the endless space covered with powdery snow.

The young woman crouched feverishly, holding her husband in her arms, trying to struggle with her energy against the invasion of the cold that penetrated her. He had drawn her to his heart and warmed her with his kisses. But the wind and the tempest had resumed their sway, and the fine snow beat in clouds around the pyramid.

"My beloved," he resumed, "we are the last inhabitants of the earth, the last survivors of so many generations. What remains of all the glories, of all the countries, of all the works of the human mind, of all the sciences, of all the arts, of all the inventions? The entire globe is at this moment only a tomb covered with snow."

"Yes," she said, "I have heard of the beauties who reigned over the hearts of kings and shone like admiral stars in the history of humanity. Love, beauty, all must end. I love you and I die. O, how I would have loved that dear treasure, the one who will never live. But no, we must not die, must we? No! * * * Come, I am no longer cold. Let us walk."

Her feet, already frozen and benumbed, had become inert. She tried to rise and fell back.

"I seem to be sleepy," she said. "O, let us sleep!"

And, throwing her arms around Omegar, she pressed her lips to his. The young man lifted her beautiful form and laid her on his knees. She was already asleep.

"I love you," he said again. "Sleep. I shall watch over you."

Then his fixed gaze, shining with a last light, lost itself in a search for the unknown in the desolate gray sky and in the silent and endless plain. No sound came to trouble the death of nature; the snow-wind alone moaned around the pyramid, and seemed to wish to awaken the old Pharaoh sleeping in its depths for so many million years.

Suddenly the noise of footsteps and moans was heard lost in the distance. Was it some lethargic awakening in the interior of the monument? Was it a heavy bird, thrown by the tempest against the dismantled steps? Was it some polar bear come with the snow? The noise ceased. A joyful cry sounded, and with one bound a dog, broken by fatigue, jumped on the sleeping couple.

It was Omegar's dog that had looked for him, followed him (how?) and found him in spite of distance, the solitude and the snow.

He called his master and mistress, licked their face and hands, and covered them with his body to warm them. But they did not awake.

And the snow continued to fall in a fine powder on the entire surface of the earth.

And the earth continued to turn on its axis night and day, and to float through the immensity of space.

And the sun continued to shine, but with a reddish and barren light. But long afterward it became entirely extinguished, and the dark terrestrial cemetery continued to revolve in the night around the enormous invisible black ball.

And the stars continued to scintillate in the immensity of the heavens.

And the infinite universe continued to exist with its billions of suns and its billions of living or extinct planets.

And in all the worlds peopled with the joys of life and love continued to bloom beneath the smiling glance of the Eternal.

Scribbler—Nice refined fellow, that young author, Pennibs. Scrawler—In what particular? Scribbler—I tried to get him into a conversation about Shakespeare the other day at a dinner and he said he never "talked shop."

Perpetual Motion Impossible

What is a perpetual motion? As yet it is but an idea; so much will be admitted by the most enthusiastic advocate of its practicality, says the Mechanical News. The utmost claim is that, according to physical law, it might be; no one claims that it is or ever has been. But millions of attempts, all ending in failure, only create a strong presumption that the thing attempted is an impossibility. They do not put it absolutely beyond doubt. Do the laws of nature make it eternally impossible?

The evident answer is that nature is herself a perpetual motion. The clouds, the winds, the waves, the flowing streams and mighty currents of electrical and other forces are in ceaseless flux and reflux. It follows, therefore, that any machine constantly played upon by any one of these perpetual forces would maintain a perpetual motion—as, for instance, a paddle wheel moved by an un-failing stream of water—the motion continuing until the materials wore out, which fills the conditions of the problem. This much, then, is conceded: a machine which could receive continual accessions of power from sources outside of itself—that is, from the inexhaustible store of nature's dynamics—would be a perpetual motion.

But that is not what the projectors mean by their use of the phrase "perpetual motion." Their argument (if such it may be called) assumes the possibility of a machine which itself generates the power that runs it. In other words, a machine that creates power—that is, a machine that generates more power than it expends—namely: power enough to resupply the original power and overcome friction besides. And such a machine is, by the eternal law of physics, an eternal impossibility. No matter how simple or how complex, no matter how delicately adjusted or how slight the friction, this inexorable law remains—the force which originally moves the machine must generate another force equal to itself (for any force less than that would not keep the machine in motion) and some additional force to overcome the friction. And the law is the same, no matter what device be adopted. Suppose it be (as in many attempts it has been) a series of falling weights on one side of a wheel, those weights must rise exactly as high on the other side of the wheel, and, let the combination be what it may, they must pass through as many rising curves as falling curves—that is, as many units of movement against as with gravitation—and the friction of the wheel be overcome besides. Suppose it were possible to reduce friction to a minimum of one unit in a machine whose power was 10,000,000 units, then the power of 10,000,000 would have to generate 10,000,001 to prevent a stoppage.

For further illustration, take the device of a horizontal wheel, the original power applied at a point A on its circumference: A moves around to its original place, there an equal power must be applied to send it around again (for, of course, whatever power sent it around once will be needed for each successive round), and whatever extra power is needed to overcome the friction. Put the original power at 100, then that 100 power must generate a power equal to 100 plus friction. Algebraically stated, your problem is to make 100=100 plus f. Of course f might be reduced to a very small amount, and it is barely conceivable that a place might be found where there is no f—, but not on this earth.

In a perfect vacuum, assuming the production of it to be possible, a top would run a surprisingly long time, there being no friction on the air; but it must rest on something, and that means friction. If a top could be suspended in mid air, with some attractive force above it which exactly balanced gravitation, and then set in motion in a perfect vacuum, the thing might be accomplished; but such a condition is obviously impossible. On this earth there is no motion without friction, and where there is friction a perpetual motion is an eternal impossibility.

The Chicago Record Broken.

A tourist who has just returned from the east says that the day he left Yokohama the native paper of that city mentioned a case of a man aged 40 this year, living in the province of Brizen, who has married and divorced thirty-five wives and is now married to the thirty-sixth.

He was first married at 18, and the reason assigned for this extraordinary example of inconstancy is that he has a younger sister of extremely jealous and rancorous disposition, who from the moment that a bride enters the house institutes a system of persecution, which soon drives the unhappy woman to ask her husband for a divorce. The husband is helpless to restrain the vagaries of his sister and cannot turn her out, so the wretched business goes on year after year. The native chronicler adds a circumstance which is improbable, even in the east. He says that in two cases the brides arriving at the door of their future home changed color and, declaring that they recognized the house as one where they had already passed some months of most miserable wedlock, fled without further parley.

Commenting upon this story, the Japan Mail says that, whether accurate or not, it illustrates the difference between Japanese and English fashions in respect of marriage. Among the lower orders in Japan sentiment is seldom allowed to play an influential part in the arrangements preliminary to matrimony. The higher the social scale the more attention is paid to the fancies of the man, and of late those of the woman also are beginning to be regarded. But the principle underlying the whole marital relation in Japan seems to be that the affection which really survives the passage of years and makes married life happy is not the love which precedes union, but the respect, esteem and sense of mutual helpfulness that grows up after it. In short, marriage in Japan is a preliminary experiment, whereas, in the west it is a final contract.

Characteristic Even in Her Dreams.

A lady who is known to be an extremist in many of her views gravely told the following dream over the coffee the other morning, to the great amusement of her husband and some friends, who declared it essentially feminine and characteristic of her sex:

She dreamed that she had died, and in the interval before the freed spirit made its heavenward way, she was an unseen observer and listener to all that took place in the room in which the poor clay she had so recently inhabited lay. She was touched with the devotion of her mother, who, like Mary of old, was always first and last beside the body soon to find sepulture; also intensely interested in the arguments, for or against cremation (this having been her own pet theory), which her friends held forth in the presence of her disembodied spirit, and longing to depart with the celestial throng awaiting her, yet mortified and thrilled on the threshold of heaven by the fact that, graven on her casket plate, her age was given as 49 instead of 32.

My Hero.

Not laurel, weathered by Fame's uncertain hand,
Nor great when measured by the world's false scales;
But on that greater battle-field, where stand
The marshaled hosts of right and wrong ne'er fails
The one I praise!

Not he whose voice among the busy throng
In blatant vainly-glorious pean floats;
But in the music of life's golden song
He strikes for me content's soft tender notes,
The one I laud!

Not he who on the garish day afar
Bursts like a sudden sun with blazing light;
But he whose life-light is the polar star
Of sympathy in stormy sea and night,
The one I trust!

Not he whose rootless faith the fickle hours
Of time consign to dust—a wayside doom;
But one whose truth, "until death part," bears flowers,
Which in eternity shall ever bloom—
The one I love!

"Rats!"

Five large gray rats are the peculiar pets of Charles Perkins, who lives on Noble street near Eighth, says the Philadelphia Press. The rodents evince great affection for him, following him about the house like dogs, run up his sleeve and come out at the breast, nestle around the rim of his hat, and perform a variety of tricks, such as leaping through a wire hoop and drawing a coach, four of them acting as horses and one as driver.

Asked how he had tamed the rats, Perkins answered:

"It is very easy when you know how."

"Well, what is the how?"

"Simply, I trap a rat in a cage, and then examine him carefully to see if he is young and not too vicious. Having selected a proper specimen, I take him to the yard and drop him in a barrel half filled with water."

"If he tries to clamber up the sides I throw him back and keep him in the water until he is completely exhausted. When he is just about to go under I take him out, pour a little brandy down his throat with a syringe and take him to the stove, where I wrap him in a piece of blanket, cuddle him and nurse him back to life."

"So grateful is he that he remains my slave forever after, fawns on me and becomes quite a pet."

Two Sharp Retorts.

President Lincoln's retort to the Englishman who was contrasting Americans and the English:

"Why," said the Briton, "you Americans do things that no English gentleman would ever think of doing. For instance, sir, I do not know of a single English gentleman who would black his own shoes."

"Indeed?" said Mr. Lincoln. "Whose would he black?"

A similar incident took place in London last summer, when an irrepressible Western girl found herself seated next a Briton at dinner. It happened that he had but recently returned from a tour in this country, and after having learned that his fair partner was from Ohio, he volunteered the remark that he "liked Boston people better than any other Americans. Because, you know, they are the only Americans who speak our language as we do."

"Indeed?" returned the young woman. "You surprise me. I had always supposed the Bostonians spoke very good English."—Harper's.

Carrying Oil.

A cargo may consist of several qualities of oil, and these are separated from each other by narrow water spaces. Some two years ago a sailing vessel was built by the Barrow Shipbuilding Company to the order of an Antwerp firm. She was designed to carry petroleum in bulk in competition with the steamers. The success attendant upon this new departure may lead to the more extensive construction of vessels of a similar nature. Petroleum vessels cannot be used for any other purpose on account of their peculiar arrangement and smell. A proposal to carry palm oil in a similar manner has been found impracticable on account of the corrosive ingredients which attack the steel instead of preserving it, as petroleum does.

Appropos to this departure in British shipbuilding, it is stated that the Persians as far back as 1760 were known to carry petroleum in bulk in their own vessels on the Caspian. Petroleum carriers are generally fitted with electric light, so as to insure a minimum of risk from fire. With every precaution that modern science can suggest the carriage of this oil is beset with much difficulty and danger.—Chambers' Journal.

Marquis di Rudini (rushing down, panic-stricken, in his night-clothes)—What was the cause of that terrific shock a few moments ago? Attendant—A messenger says a powder magazine just outside the city has blown up. Marquis di Rudini—Thank Heaven! I thought it was another letter from Blaine.

Finnish Honesty.

In trade the Finns, as a rule, are not only scrupulously honest—they are heroically, quixotically so.

A tradesman will tell you the whole truth about his wares, even when he knows perfectly well that by doing so he loses a customer whom the partial truth, a slight suppression veri, would have secured him.

"This seems exactly the kind of apparatus I am looking for," I said to a merchant in Helsingfors some months ago, in reference to an article that cost about £15, "and I will buy it at once if, knowing what I want it for, you can honestly recommend me to take it."

"No, sir; I do not recommend you take it, nor have I anything in stock just now that would suit you." And I left the shop and purchased what I wanted elsewhere. "Here's your fare," I said to a peasant in the interior who had driven me for three hours through the woods on his drosky, handing him four shillings.

"No, sir; that's double my fare," he replied, returning me half the money. And when I told him that he might keep it for his honesty, he slightly nodded his thanks with the dignity of one of nature's gentlemen from which defiant pride and cringing obsequiousness were equally absent.

The Bad Lands.

The Bad Lands of Dakota are composed of a white clay, which, by the action of rains, has been cut into hillocks. They are not high, seldom more than forty or fifty feet; but it is down one and up another the whole way. You cannot follow the water courses, for there are none; a gully, forty feet deep, with a foot and a half of mud at the bottom, is the nearest approach to a water course in the whole region. At every few yards you must stop and, with spade or shovel, cut a path down the side of a hill in order to descend, and then up the side of the one opposite in order to get up again.

The mud is as sticky as tar, and in going a few yards the wheels of a wagon become solid round cakes, and all the mules that you can hitch to it will not be able to pull it a foot further. Then the spades are brought and the wheels cleared, the operation being repeated two or three times in a hundred yards. The extent of the Bad Lands in Dakota is probably a hundred miles from north to south, by fifteen to thirty miles wide; and if the Indians find a better stronghold in this country the plainsmen would like to hear of it.

The Camphor Tree.

One of the most useful and magnificent productions of the vegetable kingdom that enriches the soil of China, more particularly the provinces of Kiang-si and Canton, is the camphor tree. This stupendous laurel, according to the testimony of learned Chinese mandarins, has been known to attain a height of 300 feet and a girth measurement of 80 feet. They seldom grow on uplands, but are to be found in abundance on the banks of many of the larger streams. Lord Amherst's embassy reports the average height of camphor trees at from 50 to 70 feet, with a stem circumference of 20 to 35 feet. Besides yielding the camphor gum of commerce, this valuable tree is the principal timber wood of the celestial empire, and is used not only in building but in most articles of furniture. The wood when dry is of a light yellow color, and though light and easy to work is durable and not likely to be injured by insects.

ORDINANCE NO. 270

Granting to the Party Herein Named the Privilege to Construct, Maintain and Operate a Street Railroad in the City of Sacramento, and Granting to Him the Right of Way for said Street Railroad over, upon and along certain Streets in said City of Sacramento.

The Board of Trustees of the City of Sacramento do ordain as follows:

Section 1. There is hereby granted to R. S. Carey, his heirs and assigns, subject to the provisions of the statutes governing the City of Sacramento, the right to construct, lay down, repair, maintain and operate, for the term of fifty years from and after the passage of this ordinance, a single or double track street railway or railroad, with all necessary and convenient tracks for curves, turn-outs, switches, side-tracks, stations, turn-tables and appendages, and to propel cars thereon by horse or mule power, or by wire ropes running under the streets and moved by stationary steam engines, or by electricity or other motive power; and to collect, receive and retain fare and compensation for the use thereof in, through, on, over and along the following streets and parts of streets in the City of Sacramento, that is to say: commencing at the intersection of O and Twenty-first streets, at the center thereof, thence running along the middle of Twenty-first street to Y street.

Amend section one (1) by adding thereto the following: "Provided, That if the cars on said railway shall be propelled by overhead wires in connection with an electric system of motive power, then the overhead wires used as electric conductors shall be hung from cross-wires, and shall not be less than twenty feet, measuring vertically, from the surface of the roadway, and shall be supported by a double line of poles, one line on each side of the street, and the poles shall be turned wood and shall be painted before being set up; and said grantee shall keep and maintain in good order and condition, at his own expense, the portion of the streets occupied by such poles so that the same at the surface about the poles may be safe and convenient to travelers with teams or vehicles at all seasons of the year, and so that there shall be no obstruction to the proper flow of water along and over the gutters constructed or to be constructed at the places where the poles may be set up. And all such poles may be set at such places along the inner curbing of the sidewalk as the Street Commissioner shall direct; and if by reason of setting up of such poles it shall be necessary to alter the watercourses, gutters, culverts or entrances to culverts, such changes or alterations shall be made at the expense of the grantee, his heirs and assigns."

Sec. 2. The rate of fare on such railroad or railway must not exceed the sum of five cents for a single fare.

Sec. 5. The grantee herein named shall pay to the City of Sacramento an annual license of five dollars upon each car run and operated upon said railroad or railway, which shall entitle him to run, manage and operate his railroad or railway every day in the year.

Sec. 4. The grantee herein named may at any time abandon any portion of the franchise hereby granted, upon filing with the Board of Trustees of the City of Sacramento a written declaration of such abandonment, particularly describing the part or portion intended to be abandoned.

Amend section four (4) by adding thereto: "And in event of such abandonment the grantee, his heirs and assigns, shall within ninety days thereafter remove the tracks, rails, ties, poles, wires and other materials from such street or portion of street so abandoned, and restore such street or portion of street to its original condition in good order and repair, and to the satisfaction of the Street Commissioner, and if such work be not done by the grantee, his heirs and assigns, it may be done by the Street Commissioner at the expense of the grantee, his heirs and assigns."

Sec. 5. The rate of speed on said railroad or railway must not be greater than eight miles per hour.

Sec. 6. The grantee herein named shall pay and be assessed for the cost of improving the portion of the street or streets embraced between the rails of the track or tracks of his railway or railroad, and for two feet on each side thereof; and such assessment shall be lien against the franchise and railroad of said grantee from the date of such assessment, and may be collected in the same manner as other assessments for improving streets are collected; and said grantee shall keep said portion of said street or streets constantly in repair, and flush with the street and with good crossings.

Amend by adding a section to read as follows:

Sec. 7. This franchise is granted upon the conditions that said grantee, his heirs and assigns, shall commence the construction of the street railway on said street within six months and complete the construction of such railway within one year from the passage of this ordinance, and that when said railway is completed the cars shall be run regularly and daily (inevitable accident excepted), over the whole of said road as often as once every hour from 8 A. M. to 8 P. M. of each day, and a failure to comply with any of the terms and conditions hereof by the grantee, his heirs and assigns shall work a forfeiture of this franchise, and said grantee, his heirs and assigns, shall thereupon restore that part of said street made use of for the railway to its original condition and leave the same in as good order and repair as the balance of the street, and to the satisfaction of the Street Commissioner; and if such work of removal be not done within ninety days from and after such forfeiture by the grantee, his heirs and assigns, then it may be done by the Street Commissioner at the expense of the grantee, his heirs and assigns, and the city shall have a lien upon such street railway and all the materials thereof for the expense of such removal and of repair of the street made necessary by putting down or removal of such railway.

Amend by adding a section to read as follows:

Sec. 8. This ordinance, so far as the same provides that said railway may be operated by any system by which electricity is made use of as the motive power, is granted and accepted upon the express provision that the Board of Trustees of the City of Sacramento shall have the power at any time to inquire into the fact whether the said system, or the practical operation thereof, is a public nuisance, or dangerous to persons and vehicles, and the City of Sacramento expressly reserves the right to take all necessary legal measures whenever, in the judgment of the Board of Trustees of said city, it may become a public nuisance, to secure the abatement of such nuisance, and the said grantee, his heirs and assigns, shall, within ninety days after the judgment or decree to that effect shall become final, and after the service upon it of written notice, remove such poles and wires as may be a nuisance or dangerous to life and property, and put the streets through which they were placed in the same condition in which they now are at the expense of said grantee, his heirs and assigns under the superintendence of the Street Commissioner. In case the same is not done by the grantee, his assigns and heirs in the time limited therefor, then the Board of Trustees may cause the same to be done, and the expense thereof shall be paid by said grantee, his heirs and assigns, and the city shall have a lien upon said street railway within its limits for said payment. In case a judgment shall at any time be obtained to abate or to remove any public nuisance created by such electric system of poles or wires, the City of Sacramento shall be entitled to recover from said grantee, his heirs and assigns, a reasonable attorney's fee, not exceeding $1,000, for services of its attorney paid by it, and such attorney's fee shall be entered in the judgment and shall be paid by the grantee, his heirs and assigns.

The said grantee shall have the right to accept the permission and privileges hereby granted and agree to comply with all of the conditions upon which the same are granted within ten days after the passage of this ordinance, and shall file said acceptance with the Clerk of the Board of Trustees of said city, otherwise this ordinance shall be null and void.

Sec. 9. This ordinance shall take effect immediately.

The Lady and the Mirror.

Many jokes, good, bad and indifferent, have been poked at the ladies for their devotion to shopping. Some one once said that a woman has been known to forget her own name while engaged in the fascinating pastime, and the statement has found many believers, always, of course, among the sterner sex. Whether all the ladies are equally oblivious to everything, is by no means certain, but a happening yesterday in a large downtown store may be taken as having some bearing on the subject.

The store, which is one of the finest in the city, has a large mirror completely covering the rear wall, serving the double purpose of ornamentation and protection by enabling the floor-walkers to watch the ever-moving crowds. The lady had been examining and pricing fabrics until her brain was in a whirl, moving from one counter to another, and all the while gradually approaching the rear of the store. At the last counter, after seeing everything that was to be seen, she heaved a sigh of regret, and bethought herself of leaving.

And just here the fun occurred. Her mind was busy with the problem of whether shrimp pink or pea-green would be a match for her complexion, providing she could purchase either, and she was not aware of her proximity to the rear. Rather, she had an idea that she was near the front, and that the large and magnificent mirror was the door. She approached it, and thinking she saw someone coming toward her, stepped to one side. Her reflection, of course, did the same. She stepped back. Ditto the reflection. Then she got angry.

"Excuse me," she said, in the clear, cutting tones peculiar to her sex when they wish to be sarcastic, "are you so fond of dancing that you must indulge in it here? If you let me pass, I'll be obliged."

No answer.

"Well," said the now thoroughly aroused woman, "I'm going out, so you'd better stand aside."

Suiting the action to the word, she took one—two—three steps and landed up against the mirror. A little scream, a blushing woman hurriedly going in the right direction this time, a general titter from the customers and clerks, and the comedy was over.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

When her majesty, the empress of Japan, drives no one is permitted to look at her from the windows or chinks in the doors or any part of the house, but must sit down by the side of the street through which she passes. Each person, man or woman, must doff hat or cap as she passes, except the women in European dress, whose heads may remain covered. No one may speak or follow the carriage and no noise of any kind is allowed in the street through which she passes.

The body of every spider contains four little masses pierced with a multitude of holes, imperceptible to the naked eye, each hole permitting the passage of a single thread; all the threads, to the number of 1,000 to each mass, join together when they come out and make the single thread with which the spider spins its web, so that what we call the spider's thread consists of more than 4,000 threads united.

Why, you talk about a woman's sphere As though it had a limit.
There's not a place in earth or heav'n,
There's not a task to mankind given,
There's not a blessing or a woe,
There's not a whispered yes or no,
There's not a life, or death, or birth,
That has a feather's weight of worth
Without a woman in it.

"I believe tobacco smoke to be a perfect disinfectant for the physician," said Dr. Klein, of Detroit, recently. "If a physician, in making his visit to a patient afflicted with any contagious disease, will keep a cigar in his mouth I don't believe he will carry the contagion away from the house. It may seem a little rude, but no sensible person will object when the object is explained."

The historical gray coat of Napoleon I, which was stolen from a museum, was found recently by the police in the Quartier du Temple in Paris. An old clothes dealer had given the thief 70 cents for it.

He—"Your husband, madam, sent me to fetch his overcoat." She—"Indeed! My husband died two years ago, and I've always feared that he went to a place where they don't need overcoats."

Watercress is said to contain very sanitary qualities. A curious characteristic of it is that if grown in a ferruginous stream it absorbs five times the amount of iron that any other plant does.

"Swing outward, oh! gates of the morning,
Swing inward, ye doors of the past;
A giant is rousing from slumber—
The people are waking at last."

The original of the song "Old Black Joe" was a native of Virginia and died recently at his home in Mount Holly, N. J., at the age of 112 years.

An Indian Origin of Man.

When the Great Spirit created the world he first made three men, all of the same color. Then He led them to a pool of water and bade them jump in and bathe. One of them obeying at once leaped in advance of his fellows and came out clean and white.

The others hesitated, but one soon followed the first. When he went in the water had become somewhat stained and he came out copper colored.

Then the third man went in. By that time the water of the pool had become black and he was consequently black when he had bathed.

Thus it happens that there are white men, red men and black men in the world.

Then the Great Spirit laid down three packages before the three men, which contained their future fate. Out of pity for the black man he permitted him to have his first choice of the parcels.

The black man, without hesitation, took the largest of the parcels; the red man, whose turn was next, took the next largest parcel, and the white man took the remaining one, which was very small.

Then the men opened their packages. That of the black man was found to contain shovels and other implements of labor, the red man's contained bows and arrows, and the white man's small parcel consisted of pens, ink and tools for light work.

From that time on each man made use of the tools he had chosen.

The work of the new census goes rapidly on, and to-day 3,500 heads are buzzing with figures and 7,000 hands are working away on the reports that have come in by the millions from every nook and corner of the United States. It is impossible to conceive the immensity of this stock-taking. The counting of the people themselves was a gigantic task, but it was completed months ago, and we now know that we have just about 65,000,000 of souls in the United States. Each one of these people, however, has a history, and the story of every one has been written down on a page of long foolscap paper and has been sent here to Washington. There are 65,000,000 of these pages, and one of the census officers tells me that if these were made of the thinnest of writing paper and laid flat one on top of the other, they would make a pile of sheets higher than the Washington Monument and so heavy that it would take several camel-back engines to carry them. From our experience with only a portion of the State of California we can realize the immense labor and calculation that must rest upon the head of the census department. To supervise a couple of hundred enumerators and experience the jeers and sneers of those who could not understand the character of the work, was enough to drive an ordinary individual to the insane asylum.

The San Francisco Music and Drama says: "Go into the heart of a great city and mingle among the poverty and squalor that is always to be found there, and you will discover men who, in the past, have held positions of affluence. Bankers, lawyers and merchants, who at one time entertained scores of guests with the most expensive luxuries in season, now find it a terrible effort to secure an adequate supply of the humble doughnut for their own nourishment. But amidst this throng of paupers you will never find an actor who has parted with his last possession. His jewelry may have disappeared, his linen may be frayed, his clothes threadbare and shabby, and his pocket void of coin; but he has always one article of property that he manages to escape with each time he is compelled to change his lodgings. It is a play. An actor without a play is almost as scarce as a moa bird or a silent woman. It matters not what his rank in his profession be, high or low, he always has a piece. It is rarely written by himself, but has generally been acquired in some mysterious manner.

In the spring a man always thinks it is cheaper to buy a lawn mower and trim all his lawns himself. In the heat of July he always knows it is cheaper to hire a laborer to do the job—but he can't persuade his wife.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to Helen A. Grant, Allen D. Grant, Edward N. Grant, Catherine Matzen, Mary M. Miller, John Doe, and Richard Roe, greeting.

You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the county of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 29th day of January, 1891, in which action EDWARD DIETERLE is plaintiff and you are defendants.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: The said action is brought for the purpose of quieting the title to that certain piece or parcel of land situated, lying and being in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, and State of California, and described according to the plan of said city, as the south twenty (20) feet of the west sixty-eight (68) feet of lot number one, in the block bounded by J and K, and 5th and 6th streets; for the purpose, also, of determining all adverse claims of the said defendants to said property; and for a decree of said Court, declaring and adjudging that the title of plaintiff to said premises is good and valid, and that neither the said defendants have, nor any of them has, any estate or interest in the same; and forever enjoining and debarring the said defendants, and each of them, from asserting any claim to said land adverse to plaintiff, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made.

And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court this 20th day of February, A. D. 1891.

Where My Heart Lies.

Under the sod where the wild grass grows,
Under the leafy trees,
Where the moaning song of the sad wind flows
Like the murmur of the seas,
There, where my thoughts all end in sighs,
There's where my heart lies.

Where the lifeless leaves rustle and fall,
Wedded to the ground,
Where the night bird's coo is the only call
That breaks the stillness round.
There, where the spirit of darkness flies,
There's where my heart lies.

The wind blows low, for death holds here
Its silent reign supreme,
And never the force of a drifting tear
Can wash away its dream.
And there, in the grave where love ne'er dies,
There's where my heart lies.
Beating the Game.

The tale is told of an old and foxy farmer who is worth a goodly amount of money and who dwells in one of the towns in the neighborhood of Boston, that upon one occasion the crafty old gentleman went to attend a county fair. It fell out that he fell into the company of a set of jovial rustics who beguiled the hours of leisure in playing the festive game of "old sledge," seated upon the hotel piazza. The farmer had played the game in his youth, and as he saw the money change hands he had an itching desire to have a share in this harvest of sudden riches.

It was not long before he had joined himself unto those men of Belial, and with them was involved in the meshes of the snares of old sledge. But, alas! it was many a long year since the farmer had played cards, and either his hand lacked cunning or the luck was against him. He steadily lost money. Being of a miserly disposition, the more he lost the more excited he became, and at last he made a rash bet of $10, apparently desperately set upon winning back what he had lost. But the fickle goddess still frowned upon him, and once more he lost. The disappointment was too much for him, and down he tumbled in a fit!

Instantly confusion reigned, and the old man was picked up, taken into the house and put on a lounge. The hotel was crowded, however; it was full of noise and confusion, and it was decided that there was nothing for it but to carry the farmer home. His horse and wagon were accordingly brought to the door, he was bundled, still to all appearance insensible, into it, and a man was deputed to drive him to his home, some miles away. The team started off, the driver anxiously solicitous for the safety of the invalid, but when they were well out of sight of the hotel the sick man suddenly straightened himself up and winked at his astonished companion.

"Well," he said, "I got out of that pretty well."

And the other for the first time recollected that there had been no settlement, and that the men to whom the old farmer had lost money had not received a cent of their winnings.

English Friendly Societies.

The returns of some of the large friendly societies for 1890 are now coming in, and, notwithstanding the increased expenditure caused by the influenza epidemic in the early part of the year, the figures in most cases show large increases both in members and funds. The Ancient Order of Foresters, numerically the largest, with its 700,000 members, added 17,587 to its number, and £159,303 to its funds, bringing the reserve capital up to £4,500,000. This society appears to be rapidly "leveling up" its actuarial deficiency, the returns showing that a proportion equal to 73.4 of its members are now paying graduated contributions according to age, as against 59.5 five years ago.

The Manchester Unity of Odd Fellows comes slightly behind the Foresters in respect to numbers, but occupies far and away the front rank of all societies in wealth, its invested capital reaching the magnificent amount of £7,250,000.

The Hearts of Oak, the largest centralized society without branches, has been advancing of late years with leaps and bounds. Its annual report just issued shows that in 1890 it added 10,000 to its membership, which now numbers 140,000, and £76,000 to its funds, totaling its reserve capital up to £1,157,518. This society admits no one to its membership over 30 years of age, and is chiefly recruited from the ranks of small shopkeepers, clerks and skilled artisans.

In the aggregate these three societies total up an adult membership of 1,500,000, with 144,000 juvenile members, and a gross invested capital of over £13,000,000.

The great burial collecting societies constitute quite another class, at the head of which stands the Prudential with assets worth £12,000,000, and which claims to have 9,000,000 policies in force. The Prudential is a joint stock limited company, which began with a capital of £2,500 about forty years ago; a few years since this grew to £200,000. According to a statement recently made by Sir Herbert Maxwell in the house of commons, the shareholders in 1887 received dividends equal to 400 per cent. on the original capital, besides bonuses amounting to £399,600.

The murderous assault made on Robert Allen upon the public streets and his robbery, together with the numerous other lesser, yet serious, crimes that have been committed here very recently, indicate there is an element infesting Sacramento city that it is very desirable we should rid ourselves of. In the case of Mr. Allen it would seem that Providence averted the commission of a brutal and deliberate murder; that he is now living is not due to the intention that was manifested by the act of the one whose hand dealt the murderous blow. We are not disposed to blame the police force that so many acts of this kind are being committed, and the perpetrators undetected. The membership of the police force is ridiculously small, and we know that they do the very best they can to protect the lives and properties of our citizens. That the force is hampered is manifest. The yearly elections have resulted universally in the retirement of experienced officers and the selection of inexperienced men, men who are willing to learn their duties, but who will not have the time to become efficient before the next annual election. There is, unfortunately, a class of citizens in this city who are at present distinguishing themselves by penuriously opposing the collection of the special tax the people voted upon themselves to pay for the work of men who served the city with fidelity as policemen. We have esteemed, and we presume from the action of the people the general esteem is, that the policy of those who have inaugurated this opposition is to save at the spigot and waste at the bung hole.

The testimony adduced in criminal cases demonstrates that those of the criminal element are in the habit of rendezvousing in particular saloons. These places are known from official and public notoriety. They should be immediately closed. That they are permitted to remain open and afford harboring places for criminals is without excuse. That the municipal authorities have the constitutional power to make and enforce police regulations so potential as to close them is beyond doubt. That if rigid ordinances are passed and enforced there will come popular approval, will hardly be seriously controverted. It strikes us this is an advantageous time that such action be taken. Following such a line of action, and with a strict enforcement of the vagrancy law, we venture Sacramento will be severely avoided by the criminal class. We note an intimation that summary popular justice should be dealt out; there is nothing to be gained by that. A rigid enforcement of the laws we now have, and of regulations the Trustees have power to make, will very quickly settle the matter. Stringent reasonable criminal laws have not harmed well-disposed citizens, nor will they; that they may destroy the business of crooks is a matter with which the body of the people have no sympathetic interest. We suggest that the city authorities close down all the dives, and that the police arrest all suspected characters for vagrancy.

This most brutal and cowardly attempt at assassination recalls the early history of Mr. Allen. He is one of the pioneers of the State, and after passing through all the trials and hardships of an early frontier life, to be stricken down in his advanced years by the hand of a murderous midnight robber within a few feet of his home, is something horrible to contemplate. We have known Mr. Allen from our earliest infancy—ever since we can recollect events and men. In the early "fifties" he kept the Monte Cristo Exchange, near what is now called Natoma Station, on the Sacramento Valley Railroad. At that time all that part of the country was a wilderness, save the mining camps at Negro Bar and Mormon Island. The wayside stopping places, one of which Mr. Allen kept under the name just mentioned, within the range of eight or ten miles, were Saulsbury's, a few miles west of Mr. Allen's tavern; the home of Hartford Anderson, two miles and a half east; the Lexington House, kept by John Clarken, father of R. M. Clarken, the attorney of this city, about half a mile farther east. Then came the early camp of Negro Bar, where James S. Meredith's store was the source of supply for the miners in the neighborhood. Still above was the older camp, Mormon Island, where our present Superior Judge, A. P. Catlin, was engaged in mining. Every vestige of these places except a few relics at Mormon Island has vanished. This is a brief outline of the surroundings at that time. Bob Allen, as he was even at that early day familiarly called, was always popular with miners and teamsters. It is said that the impressions made on a child's mind always remain, and we are a living illustration of that fact. That which is most likely to have a lasting impression on a boy's mind is a due regard for the wants of his stomach. We used to make frequent trips in the neighborhood of the Monte Cristo Exchange in hunting excursions, and, boy-like, was generally hungry when we came to Bob Allen's house. Here comes the force of our logic on lasting impressions: Bob Allen never allowed us to go past his house without calling us in and giving us a hearty meal—being very young at the time, he never would accept any pay for these favors. These generous impulses were characteristic of the man in those days and were attributes of his character through his life. It is our earnest prayer that Bob Allen may recover, and that the brutal and cowardly assassins may be brought to justice.

A short time ago Professor Swing delivered a splendid lecture in Chicago on "Beauty and the Mind," during which he maintained that loveliness is as inseparable from man as his powers of reasoning. His inspiration went to the extent that beauty and the mind are inseparable. "It is one of the languages of the human spirit. Therefore the more culture in our world the more there will be of beauty, just as words grow in number and power when the great poets and great orators pass through a Greece, a Rome, a Germany and an England. As there is a human condition which needs only a hundred words, so there is a human littleness which does not ask for much of beauty. It is when the mind has grown large and warm, it asks the entire kingdom of nature to come to help it express its grief or gladness. Beauty, coming by the slow unveilings made by human thought, coming just as politics, and science, and religion come, elaborated by minds the strongest and purest, the public must not accept as beauty all that is offered by the old ballet, which sprang up under Catherine de Medici. Balzarini and Novene created it. Are we to ask Catherine de Medici and her times for lessons in beauty? The dance, that time-keeping of living forms to beautiful music, ought to feel the higher and better thought of this nobler age. When the slums can make our laws, our religion and our philosophy, they can make our beauty. Good women and good girls have danced in the ballet, but they have done so in an age which has permitted vice and ignorance to rule in the divine empire of decoration! Wonderful blunder of our age to send its wise men out after money and science, and send its light-headed and lawless out to find the Eternal King in the world of loveliness. Wise men for money! A fool for beauty!"

The poor are the salt of the earth. One of the problems of our social fabric is developed by the text above given. The number of our almshouses, asylums and charitable institutions, of which we are so boastful, are in fact the greatest detriment to reform in the condition of the situation, or the amelioration of the condition of the paupers of the country. It is a fact also, that every time money or assistance is given to beggars on the streets without judicious inquiry, harm is done. Philanthropists have for years endeavored to adjust the subject of pauperism on theories, and indeed have put into practice great schemes which embody the various almshouses and other charitable institutions, but the remedy only seems to increase the evil. As a matter of fact, pauperism is an imported article, and not in any considerable degree indigenous to the soil of America. There may be some poverty which is the outgrowth of our improvidence, but the genuine pauper comes from the slums of Europe. Poverty and pauperism are not synonymous. Those who have investigated the subject and gone to the root of the evil lay the great bulk of pauperism to scum and criminal classes that are imported from the older countries. When they come here the heredity and environment continues, thus the pauper and criminal, by reason of that heredity and environment, produce only in kind when settled upon us. It is rare that this class of people ever shake off their early habits. Most of them are either of weak physical, mental or moral constitutions, and the reflex of bad homes and evil associations remains with them even in our land of thrift and plenty.

No matter what reformatory or legislative measures may be invoked for the promotion of social purity, pauperism seems to grow, and there is no reduction in the vicious propensities so deeply instilled into the foreign pauper. Pauperism is the prime cause for crime. A majority of crimes can be traced to the environment of the original pauper, even several generations back. As an evidence of this statement it appears from the annual report of the trustees of the Children's Home of Washington county, Ohio, that for two years preceding the report 66 per cent. of the number of the inmates were related by blood or marriage. In Berlin there is a reformatory institution which shows the posterity of a criminal and pauper family of two sisters to be 834 persons. Among these were 106 illegitimate children, 164 prostitutes, 17 pimps, 142 beggars, 64 inmates of poorhouses, and 76 guilty of serious crimes.

The great bulk of pauperism is centered in the large cities; the country is not burdened with any considerable degree of pauperism. This goes to prove that pauperism and crime are kindred spirits, and can thrive only amidst the denser population of the great cities. A writer in Arena has given a truthful picture of the power of environment over the minds and acts of those subject to that which is evil: "The brains we possess in childhood develop as we grow older; and the character of that development depends upon our environment. The seed cannot grow in an uncongenial soil or climate, nor can those brain tissues which enable us to judge correctly between right and wrong develop amid vile surroundings. We cannot tell what physical change is wrought in the brain by a life in dens of wickedness, but we do know from the actions which that brain dictates that it becomes steeped in foul thought, and sometimes seems incapable of willing a good deed. Take, for example, a boy brought up in the slums around Tomkins Square, in New York City. From his earliest childhood he is of necessity familiar with all manner of wickedness; the best dressed women of his neighborhood are fallen women; the boys who have the most money to spend are those who lead vicious lives; the brightest house is the saloon. New York City is the metropolis of vice as she is of trade, and every vice in the long catalogue of sin has a representative practitioner among the varied nationalities that swarm her slums. I am told by the most eminent of her Police Justices that there is no known vice of ancient or modern times that has not, some time or other, been recorded in her police court records as an offense committed. Can a child spend his life amid such environment without being, both in body and brain, affected by it? For a child to grow up virtuous in such a locality is little less than a miracle—and the day of miracles has passed. If a child is born and bred to manhood in such environment, he has no choice but to become wicked. He is not free to choose good from evil. He has no discriminating sense of right and wrong. His moral responsibility is nil. What little conscience he may have inherited is soon blunted and lost. He has no conscious remorse—no self contempt for his wickedness. He is beyond reformation; for his brain has been shaped by the thoughts which his environment necessarily engenders, until it is incapable of willing virtue—just as the feet of certain Chinese women are put in clamps until they are permanently deformed and incapable of locomotion."

Whether social improvement can ever be inculcated in the progeny of the pauper, is a question for the consideration of the future philanthropist, for certain it is the past shows that he has not done much towards the social purity of this class. He in the past has failed to deter the vicious offspring of the pauper from crime and immorality. The first thing necessary is preventative in its nature, and that is to put a stop to importation of the thousands of foreign paupers. Possibly the great secret, after that is accomplished, rests in that magical word—Education.

C. P. Huntington, during his recent trip through Central California, evidently took note of the country and the unlimited resources of that section. The comments of Mr. Huntington in his correspondence with a friend are earnest and forcible. The fertility of the soil was a revelation to him, and he is pleased to make the acknowledgement. The suggestions of the great railroad president are deserving of consideration by the large land owners in the central portion of the State—indeed elsewhere, but he directs his advice to those along and in the great Sacramento basin. The following is the right kind of talk and advice, and shows a progressive spirit in Mr. Huntington; shows that he has an interest in the community as well as in his railroads: "The whole region under consideration is capable of supporting a hundred land owners where there is now one; and if it were understood at the East, particularly in such districts as the Dakotas and North Minnesota, where the climate is inhospitable for the greater part of the year, that land like this could be obtained at reasonable prices, it would be but a short time before we should see in the places in California I have mentioned, not great wheat fields with scarcely a habitation in sight, not habitations with no trees around them, but the view of these places would be one of pleasing cultivation, beautiful homes and a country life more attractive than is possible in any other country. What is wanted is hundreds of thrifty homes in the midst of cultivated gardens and orchards, and this should be here where the gardens and orchards are capable of producing all varieties of fruit and market produce. California needs population on these large, unoccupied stretches of fertile land, and it cannot be that the world is sufficiently advertised concerning her resources, or greater populations would now occupy her territory. I believe that a healthy and rapid immigration to California from the classes which would be most welcome could be induced by work of this kind done continuously and earnestly, and such work should be persisted in. It is a work which should appeal to the patriotic pride of every citizen of California, because its results will redound to the material prosperity of the whole State and of every interest in it."

The number of pupils enrolled in Californian public schools is 221,756. Total expenses of public schools in this State, $5,119,097. This makes a per capita on each pupil of $23.08 annually. From this table, which is taken from the census bulletin of April 23d—just issued at Census Department—it appears that California has expended more per capita for school purposes than any other State. The Western States show the highest amounts paid for teachers salaries, California leading. Still, it must be confessed that educators in this State are not more than adequately—if even that—paid.

"PUREFOY."

From his earliest childhood Lord Purefoy had the benefit of every good example and precept which money could procure. His mother, left a widow with her only child, could not bring herself to expose him to the temptations of a public school, but had him grounded in Latin by a governess whose high moral character and educational powers were attested by three duchesses, and intrusted him subsequently to the care of a gentleman who, as a fellow of Balliol and chaplain to a bishop, had earned and deserved a reputation for all desirable knowledge and virtue. Immediately before Lord Purefoy reached the age at which he became qualified to sit and legislate among his peers two resident tutors and three who visited the house daily were engaged in putting on the final touches. He came of age at the country seat of his family, where he owns seven parishes, and returned immediately afterward to London with his mother. He was, and is, a charming and virtuous young man. For twenty-one years and as many days he never gave his mother a moment's real uneasiness; but on the day three weeks after he had attained his majority he walked into her boudoir and, without wasting time over any preliminary explanations, announced that he was engaged to be married. The Dowager Lady Purefoy was seated in her favorite rocking-chair and the start of horror which she gave almost sent her backwards out of it. As it was, being a young woman for her age, she extended her feet, gripped the arms and, by a strong effort, maintained her equilibrium. The danger and her escape from it steadied her nerves.

"Married, my dear boy!" she cried. "What do you mean? Who is she? Where did you meet her?"

Lord Purefoy answered the last question first.

"I met her, mother," he said slowly and quietly, as if his mind dwelt with pleasure on the incident, "in St. James' park."

"Who introduced you?"

"No one."

Lord Purefoy had been admirably educated, but he had never been checked. Before ten minutes were over there had been a "row royal" between mother and son; and she had learned that the family temper, till then dormant, had undoubtedly been inherited by her gentle-mannered son, and also that the future Countess of Purefoy was a barmaid at a Regent-street restaurant who had asked him the time as he walked home after listening to a debate from the Peers' gallery in the House of Commons. In three days Lord Purefoy had gone into chambers in Piccadilly, owing to his mother's refusal to receive his fiancée, and the date fixed for the marriage was in every "society" paper. Congratulations and the reverse poured in on him; but, having gathered the general drift of his relatives' correspondence from the first two or three epistles which he received from them, Lord Purefoy took to burning their letters unread. He was lighting a cigarette with one, at the head of which he had seen the crest of a distant cousin, when a word or two which he could not help seeing caused him to pause and unroll it.

Dear Purefoy: So delighted to hear of your approaching wedding, and of your intention to marry for love a woman whom you have chosen for yourself, and who no doubt is in every way worthy of you. Come down and stay with us for a week, and bring her with you. We go to the Limes tomorrow, so come soon. Your affectionate cousin,

KITTY GOLIGHTLY.

Now, Lord Purefoy had not seen Lady Golightly since he was 16 and had heard such stories whispered at the family councils of the doings at her ladyship's riverside residence as had made his hair curl with horror. If he had seen her on the day before he received her invitation, leaving his mother's house after a visit of an hour's duration, he would not have recognized her, or would hardly have believed that she had been received there. Nevertheless, he answered her note in the affirmative and went; and he took Persephone

Giles with him, picturing to himself as they whizzed out of Paddington the reception which he would give the Golightlys some day in return for their early recognition of his beloved one.

"Are they rich, dear?" asked Miss Giles.

"Always in debt," he answered; "nobody's enemies but their own, I believe, but foolishly improvident."

"Like as not they are after your money, dear boy," she said.

"A Purefoy never imputes motives," he answered, adding, as she still looked dissatisfied, "you shall help your relatives and I will assist mine." And they accomplished the rest of the journey with her head upon his shoulder, while she in turn pictured herself setting up every uncle and cousin who had been kind to her in palatial public houses, and sprinkling with the dust of her haughty chariot wheels those who had thwarted her in childhood or prophesied evil results when she adopted the bar as a profession and exposed herself to the temptations of the metropolis. Arrived at the Limes they found everyone had gone upstairs to dress for dinner except Lady Golightly, who received them in the hall and took Persephone upstairs at once to show her her room. Lord Purefoy walked behind them, bearing what his fiancée called her "reticule." It was in crimson plush and would, no doubt, have looked charming with a coronet upon it. Two of the footmen had been carrying up the luggage and were coming out of the room. "Bill!" cried Persephone as one of the men passed her. The man turned; he was a good-looking young fellow with well-oiled hair and a sickly smile. He knew Persephone, that was evident, but he did not seem quite prepared for what followed. She is a warm-hearted girl, and before Lord Purefoy quite realized that a mutual recognition had taken place, his betrothed had kissed Sir Harry Golightly's valet under his mistress's nose. Lady Golightly had so complete a command over her features that she says she never changed features or smiled; she also says that the scene was unplanned and unrehearsed, which may be true. "Of course I knew his name was Giles," she told the ladies when she went down stairs, "but I could not guess all Gileses were first cousins."

"And Lord Purefoy?" said some one.

"Oh, he has told her never to be ashamed of her relatives and quoted Lady Clara Vere de Vere and King Cophetua and the Bible and all sorts of things, I know; but he did look rather uncomfortable. The person I felt sorry for was the man; he looked as if he wished the stair carpets would open and swallow him safely down into the servants' hall." Then some of the men came into the room and her ladyship was silent. Lord Purefoy and Miss Giles came down last and were duly introduced. The other people evidently knew one another and their hostess well; they showed great pleasure at being introduced to Persephone and some surprise when she shook hands with them all round. It was a ceremony which Lord Purefoy would have cut short if he could have caught her eye. Catching a person's eye is difficult, even when you sit opposite to her at dinner; and Lord Purefoy, on one or two occasions, tried it in vain, much regretting that Lady Golightly should have separated him from the object of his affections. Champagne always flows at the Limes and Persephone evidently liked the brand supplied. She apparently also liked the conversation of Captain Masham, who sat next her; at all events, her laughter was "frequent and painful (to Lord Purefoy) and free." He felt for what he correctly imagined to be her foot under the table and he pressed it warningly.

"Someone's squeezing my foot under the table," she said to Captain Masham, in her outspoken, innocent way. She did not know how loudly she was talking, nor reckon on a sudden pause in the conversation, which made her remark audible to every one at the table; but she did not mind, especially as no one laughed and no one seemed surprised. Indeed, it was curious how much everyone seemed to take Persephone as a matter of course. The ladies did not speak to her, but the men addressed her across the table and she answered them freely, all except Lord Purefoy, who grew graver and more silent as the meal proceeded. She was a very handsome girl, and she looked very pretty as she grew animated, though the hand with which she was inclined to gesticulate was not so white as Lady Golightly's. Lord Purefoy had paid a good price for her dress; it struck him at dinner that there was not quite so much of it as his hostess and her fair guests seemed to think requisite. Perhaps their necks and arms were not equal to those of Persephone.

"She is a charming girl," said Lady Golightly to him in the drawing-room after dinner; "so natural." "Yes, yes, of course; she is quite a child of nature," he said, uneasily.

"She has been telling us stories of her past life," said Lady Golightly; "I wonder if you know them all."

Lord Purefoy blushed furiously; in spite of his strict education he had understood one of Persephone's anecdotes sufficiently to have warned her then and there not to repeat such things to anyone.

"Where is she?" he said.

"In the conservatory with Captain Masham. She seems to have quite captivated him; you had better be careful, though."

"Is he the Captain Masham who—?"

"Oh, Purefoy! did the bishop's chaplain let you read the divorce reports? Poor Charlie! he figured rather badly in that case, I know."

"I wish you would show me the way to the conservatory, Cousin Kate," said Lord Purefoy.

Now Persephone was sitting in a very dark corner, and Persephone according to her lights, was doing no wrong. Perhaps she was chilly; perhaps she did not know it was Captain Masham's arm and not the back of a wicker chair against which she was leaning. She certainly did not know that the week before a young man who was reckoned to be on the point of proposing to a niece of Lady Golightly's was tracked into the conservatory and the clear, cold, useful brilliancy of the electric light suddenly turned on with a snap just as he was following her on his knees around the little marble fountain. The joke was in the worst possible taste, and the roar of laughter which the situation caused broke off, for the time, at least, a fairly promising love affair and caused a grand quarrel in the smoking-room afterward. It was only for a second that Lady Golightly turned on the electric light, twisting the little ivory button first to the right and then to the left. The family solicitor thought Miss Giles must really be a very nice girl to accept so small a sum as £5,000 and wondered why Lady Purefoy, who paid it, should say the whole affair had cost her £7,500. Perhaps Lady Golightly could explain.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Edward Harrigan has already completed an act of a new local play that he will use next season.

The refrain of a rollicking hymn sung at a colored church goes like this: "I've been tempted, I've been tried, I've been to the river and been baptized."

A number of capitalists in Paris, according to French papers, have decided to build an immense theatre for the purpose of producing the Oberammergau Passion Play next year. The stage is to be large enough for 1,500 people.

The London papers are grievously shocked because the Duke of Edinburgh, a son of Queen Victoria, has been engaged in leading an amateur orchestra. Now if he had been devoting himself to baccarat or scandal making, or gambling, or some other royal and "gentlemanly" pursuit, no one would have dared complain.

Lotta is one of the richest actresses in America today—a gratifying result which she owes to her own histrionic abilities and the sound business judgment of her mother, Mrs. Crabtree. The latter has complete control of the actress' financial investments in theatres, business blocks and real estate, and, in fact, for many years she practically has been the business manager of her daughter. Lotta's career has been singularly successful, and it has in it a large measure of encouragement for ambitious and unknown members of her profession. She began her theatrical life at the bottom.

"I will give you $500," writes Mrs. Cora Urquhart-Potter to a literary friend, "for the first act, $1,000 for the second, $2,000 for the third, and $4,000 for the fourth and last act of the new play to be written for me on a theme of the day and time—dealing with Americans—which shall have an absolutely new motive, the interest in which shall be continued to the last scene." So difficult is it for a dramatist to secure a new motive—or what the phrase may be taken to mean, an absolutely new application of one of the familiar motives of human action—that Mrs. Potter's offer is by no means as munificent as it would seem.

At Dr. Bill a young lady, in commenting on the performance, made what is politely called "a bad break." Louise Allen had just finished the kangaroo dance and had made a particularly ambitious effort to kick the brass-work off the top boxes. "That young lady evidently isn't anxious to get a husband," remarked a pretty girl in the audience to her escort. "Why?" he inquired, through his opera glasses. "Why? Because her garters aren't yellow," she answered without thinking, and then realizing what she had said she burst out into a livid blush that fairly melted the starch out of the young fellow's collar.

If the theatrical notices are not misleading, the Egyptian-Roman drama has for its dramatis personæ a talented asp—and some human characters, male and female. This suggests the immeasurable possibilities of the coming drama. If some enterprising dramatist would meet success let him contrive a cast like this: Leading lady, a python; leading gent, a jaguar; villain (gambling type), a tiger; high comedy, a genteel gorilla; low comedy, a parrot; soubrette, a kitten (over 60 years old); ingenue, a 2-year-old filly; supers, Edwin Booth, Mary Anderson, Henry Irving and Tomaso Salvini. With such a cast any playwright must score an enormous triumph. Even Shakespeare has done nothing like it.

The Japanese have made great strides in popular education of late years. It might not be safe to send Blair there; they might get on to him.

Books are useful accessories in the discharge of life's duties; amusing companions in hours of rest and recuperation; partners in the failures and triumphs of existence. That mature man or woman has lost the best sights and sounds of earth's pilgrimage who has not courted their friendship.

The interest felt in labor and social questions by Americans is likely to be stimulated by the talks which Mrs. Annie Besant, the bright woman from London, is to give in this country. Mrs. Besant is well known as a frank, eloquent and outspoken advocate in behalf of the people of all nations.

"The Speculator" is a realistic story by Clinton Ross, descriptive of the feverish life of Wall street. The story is somewhat like Zola's "Money"; it has all of Zola's graphic and powerful portrayal with none of his coarseness of expression or thought. It is quite apparent that Mr. Ross possesses a thorough knowledge of his ground, and the story is so vivid and faithful to detail as to recall most emphatically the tireless care and unrest of "the American Bourse" and its surroundings.

"A Field of Tares," a novel by Clo Graves, is the story of a woman whose life was ruined and tainted by her own sin, and who at last, reckless and desperate, takes her destiny into her own hand, and defies fate. A creature of passionate nature with the mad and selfish love of a guilty woman bent upon her own satisfaction, she stops at nothing until the gulf of a daughter's ruin stares her in the face, and her husband's honor is imperiled; she finds but one method of escape reserved, and that, a crime; she sweeps the obstacle from her path. Retribution finally overtakes her and death presents a claim which will not be brushed aside like that of circumstance or destiny. She dies, a victim of unconquered will.

Let Frenchmen keep their French morals and their degrading novels; we have need for better and purer than they can or ever will give us; there is wrong enough at home without importing vice, and all honor to the publisher who sets the seal of disapproval upon the inflowing tide of sensual literature, by refusing to be the medium through whom it reaches the public. The more ruthlessly a book is scored, the more widespread its perusal; condemn and its publishers rub their hands in glee, hearing in their imaginations the clink of fast increasing coins. The only hope for the ultimate and complete disappearance of this false-hued erotic literature is to trust to the native refinement which revolts at coarse sensualism, and the innate good sense and judgment which is able to tear aside the gauzy covering of tinted phrasing and luxurious portrayal from the bare and diseased skeleton whose home is the lurid brain of a misguided author.

The author is bound to have a hard time of it. He must be prepared to be opposed by every variety of obstacle that the genius of poverty and the genius of envy can event. There is one chance in a hundred that what he does accomplish in spite of divers humiliating hindrances will be esteemed of contemporaneous humanity, and there is but one chance in five thousand that, even after the enjoyment of this rare approval, that work will survive to be honored with the scrutiny of posterity. Yet he who has the true spirit within him will not hesitate to undertake the course which lies over stony and thorny places, cheerfully encountering every difficulty in the hope that betimes he shall issue from tempest and tribulation into the elysium where immortality awaits the heroic comer. Literature, steadfastly and bravely pursued, brings certain sweet rewards. The pursuit itself is delightful, so full is it of dignity, of enthusiasm, of variety, of repose. It presently breeds, too, in the human breast a delicious vanity, a serene consciousness of superiority to other conditions of mankind. Why, there is no contempt more beautiful in its sincerity than that of the starving poet for those who have acquired riches by means of speculation, trade or inheritance. Over his leeks and jar of cheap wine does Flaccus feel an exuberance of independence which never shall thrill the bosom of Flavius gorged with lampreys and Mastic. Communion with nature, the sweets of study and of contemplation, the delights of composition, the power of producing creations of the intellect, the ability of conveying to others the music of the soul, the competency to interpret the philosophy of the heart, the power to express in words that may not die the goodness of God, the beauty of the world and the sweetness of human life—these are some of the rewards of a literary life, and they are ample compensation for the occasional buffetings of the elements and a chronic emptiness of the duodenum.—Eugene Field.

A New York doctor has discovered that carelessness in his practice is not excusable because he did not expect to get his pay. The Court held him guilty of malpractice just the same for the pauper as for the millionaire patient.

The French physician who announced that he had discovered the way to destroy the bacilli of tuberculosis has experimented with brilliant success. The treatment killed the patient upon whom it was tried, but every single bacillus in him died.

A famous college president, a clergyman, was addressing the students in the chapel at the beginning of the college year. "It is," he said, in conclusion, "a matter of congratulation to all the friends of the college that this year opens with the largest freshmen class in its history." And then, without any pause, he turned to the scripture lesson for the day, the third Psalm, and began reading, in a voice of thunder: "Lord, how they are increased that trouble me,"

The recent illness of Associate Justice Bradley has brought out the fact, his friends say, that he will ask shortly after the Court reassembles in October to go upon the retired list, where he could have gone upon full pay five years ago. Mr. Bradley is an able jurist and stands high in the estimation of his acquaintances, but he is almost 77 years old and is enfeebled in health. It is said that Associate Justice Field will ask to retire about the same time. He has also passed the age limit some time.

There has been some sense and a great deal of nonsense written about the "blue laws" of Connecticut, which some writers say were borrowed from the colony of Massachusetts Bay, the laws of the colony being "blue" enough for any use. Most of these laws were enacted prior to 1640, a fact which will, to some extent, help to mitigate their severity. Below will be found some of the choice morsels from this old code: "No woman shall kiss her children on the Sabbath or upon fasting days. No one shall run on the Sabbath day, or walk, except reverently to and fro in his garden. No one shall buy or sell land without the permission of the Selectmen. A debtor in prison swearing he has no estate, shall be let and sold to make satisfaction. Whosoever setteth a fire in the woods and that fire burns a house, shall be put to death for the crime. Whosoever shall bring cards or dice into this dominion the same shall be fined £5. No one can be a freeman or vote unless he be converted and a member in full connection with a church. No food or shelter shall be offered a Quaker, Adamite or other heretic. No Catholic priest shall be allowed to abide in this dominion. No one shall cross a river with anyone but an authorized ferryman." The following selections are from the colonial records of Massachusetts, all of them being laws enacted prior to the establishment of the "Body of Liberties" in 1640: "October, 1632—It is ordered: That no person shall take tobacco publicly under penalty of 2s. 6d. nor privately in his own house, or the house of another, before strangers, and that two or more shall not take it together, anywhere, under the aforesaid penalty for every offence." In November, 1637, the records decreed that "all former laws against tobacco are repealed, and tobacco set at liberty." After it was "set at liberty" the people seem to have overindulged in the soothing weed, for the next year we read in the order of the General Court that "finding that since the repeal of the laws against tobacco it is more abused than before, the court therefore orders that no man shall take any tobacco in the fields, except on a journey, or at meal times, under a pain of a fine of 12d. for every offence; nor shall he take any tobacco in or near any dwelling house, barne, corne or hay-rick as may likely endanger the firing thereof; nor shall he take tobacco while stopping at any inn where the master thereof may take offence at the same." Swearing also had its drawbacks in those good old days, as may be seen from the following, taken from the Massachusetts records of September, 1636: "Robt. Shrotehose, for swearing 'by the blood of God,' was sentenced to have his tongue put in a clyft stick and to stand so by the space of haulte an houre." Virginia, not to be outdone in the "blue law" line, enacted a few of her own. Here is a sample taken at random: "What man or woman soever who shall rob any garden, being set to weed the same, or willfully pluck up any root, herb or flower, to spoil, waste or steal the same, or shall pluck grapes or steal ears of corn growing in the field, the same shall be punished with death."

NOTES.

This is a very good world, but the enterprising man is compelled to kick it a little once in a while to make it recognize him.

Moody said to the Bostonians the other day: "There are 50,000 men in this city who would be Christians in ten minutes if they could get into heaven by some side door."

First Student—You told me you had a rare and curious manuscript to show me. I see nothing here but a receipted tailor's bill. Second Student—And you see nothing rare or curious about that?

The disastrous forest fires in the Northwest have created great distress. Immense forests have been destroyed, in addition to a vast amount of other property. The settlers in Michigan have suffered the most.

A sensible woman on the promenade was heard to remark: "I always feel like apologizing when a man steps on my gown. I realize that a woman should hold up her gown and keep it out of the way of men."

A new teacher in a Boston school becoming disgusted with the conduct of a scholar, told him to "go straight home," whereupon the imp replied that it was impossible, as the streets of Boston were not built that way.

Some enterprise of the property owners on J and K streets would make our city one worthy of our pride, and attractive to all. It is about time to awake from our Rip Van Winkle sleep, as far as the business portion of the city is concerned.

A man who has tried it says that two or three dandelion leaves chewed before going to bed, will always induce sleep, no matter how nervous or worried a man may be. And they cause no weariness or headache, such as follows the use of chloral or morphine.

It is announced that Queen Victoria has opened her purse-strings and laid aside $1,500,000 to pay the most pressing of the Prince of Wales' debts. Inasmuch as the Queen's vast wealth was derived from the British tax-payers the latter are the real liquidators of the gambling and other liabilities of their future king.

If we can look upon the beauties of nature, and listen to nature's song birds on Sunday, where is the harm in listening to the inspiring music of the concert bands on Sunday? They are, after all, the work of the Creator. Music is the greatest of the Creator's work. The angel and the harp are symbols of heaven.

If Europe is really going to have a war, now's the time. All the kings and princes and duchies and people holding copyrights on the "divine right" of fighting each other have polished up their guns and laid in plenty of powder. What is more important, our wheat crop this year will be nearly twice as large as usual.

An eminent physician has discovered a process of transplanting hearts from one living animal to another. This is no new discovery in one sense of the word. Every young lady and gentleman, at some period of his or her life, has experienced the operation of exchanging hearts, even to the extent of a re-exchange when the fervid current began to cool.

Seven Democratic Governors will retire from office this year. They are Boles, of Iowa; Buckner, of Kentucky; Jackson, of Maryland; Russell, of Massachusetts; Hill, of New York; Campbell, of Ohio, and Davis, of Rhode Island. Boles and Campbell will surely be succeeded by Republicans, and Russell and Hill ought to have Republican successors.

Careful habits of exercise, diet, drink, proper hours for sleep and for eating—many little things of that nature make the difference between success and failure. He who husbands his natural strength will have it long to exert, and will be correspondingly in intercourse. Our American nervous race is apt to indulge too early, and waste the incense in the vase which should last three score and ten.

The Christian Conference now in session at Chicago denounces secret societies. This orthodox body even go so far as to advocate the extermination of all temperance secret organizations. All ministers of the gospel are called upon to preach against secret societies, evidently under the idea that such are the instruments of the devil. These light-headed, narrow-minded bigots are too good for this earth.

Emperor William of Germany is creating a storm about himself. The telegrams announce that the young Kaiser's character and eccentricities are being discussed with a freedom hitherto unknown in Germany for years. Everybody is wondering what the Emperor will do next, and speculating where the empire will land if he persists in using "his policy," as he is pleased to term it. In a nutshell, the people are grumbling, and there is a widespread spirit of complaint, which is becoming very serious.

Occasionally there are letters received here from alleged solicitors, announcing that there are unclaimed estates in England due the recipients, and which for a small advance of coin can be obtained. These are all frauds. Of all claims investigated, not one has been found to have had any validity whatever. Claimants should also bear in mind that the statute of limitations fixed the period with which unclaimed estates revert to the Crown, and this period is twenty years. There are no large sums of money awaiting claimants in the Bank of England.

We have laws, ample in terms, to eradicate those festering sores on the body politic—those dens of vice and crime which it is a libel to call saloons. Mr. Mayor, Trustees, Policemen, put the axe to the root of the tree of vice beneath whose spreading branches unclean things do congregate. Now, while the trees are leaving, it would be an exceedingly appropriate thing to make the rounders, pimps and all doubtful characters—leave. This may be a little play upon words, but the officers should see to it that there is no play in executing the latter part of the sentiment.

When we contemplate the work of Robt. P. Porter, superintendent of eleventh census, there is amazement at its magnitude. Superintendent Porter is a rare executive officer and an incomparable statistician. He has performed the immense and difficult task set before him by law with conspicuous ability. The vastness of the scope of inquiries can only be appreciated by those who have been intimately associated with the details of collecting and compiling statistics. They embrace about every subject upon which figures can throw light. They involve the painstaking labor of thousands of clerks and hundreds of special agents who have garnered in every field of industry and enterprise and thoroughly explored the domain of sociology in all its phases.

Joshua S. Vincent, first sergeant of Company I, of the famous New York regiment that came to California in 1847, under the command of Col. J. D. Stevenson, died on April 14, 1891, at Linn Creek, Camden county, Missouri. The company was organized at Bath, Steuben county, New York, on June 26, 1846, and took its departure from that place on August 1st en route for Governor's Island, N. Y. harbor. The Farmers' Advocate, of Bath, under date of August 5, 1846, said: "The Steuben volunteers, under Captain Shannon, left Bath for New York on Saturday morning. We cannot refrain the repetition that we never saw a finer company, all intelligent and vigorous young men, of many different trades, excellent habits, urbane manners, and enterprising spirits. The mutual farewell echoed the best wishes and hopes, and a large number of our citizens volunteered carriages and escort to cheer them on board the Steuben steamer, which took its departure amid the acclamations of the mass of people assembled at the wharf." On September 26th, they left New York for California, and arrived at San Francisco March 19, 1847. The company was discharged from service Sept. 25, 1848. Its Captain, William E. Shannon, was a lawyer; in 1849, when but 27 years of age, he was elected a member of the State constitutional convention. In the same year Shannon was appointed by General Bennet Riley a Judge of the First Instance, with criminal jurisdiction, and he opened his Court in Sacramento in September, 1849. It is rather amusing to look over the minutes of these early tribunals—they exist in the office of the County Clerk. The first case before Judge Shannon was a prosecution against a party for stealing a cow. The defendant was convicted and fined $200 and costs, which amounted to $515. Court fees were somewhat higher then than now. Shannon died here of cholera in November, 1850. Most of the members of the company are dead. Captain E. D. Shirland, of this city, was originally a member, but was transferred to Company G.

That pioneer educator, J. C. Pelton, contributes a valuable and interesting article to the Golden Era on the first public school in California. The public school system was inaugurated on the 26th day of December, 1849, at San Francisco, with three pupils. We extract the following from Mr. Pelton's article: The first school ordinance of San Francisco was drawn and presented to the Council of San Francisco by Hon. H. C. Murray, afterwards the first Chief Judge on the Supreme Bench of California; this worthy pioneer long since took his seat before a court higher than any of earth. The first school law of the State of California, drawn by myself and Hon. John G. Marvin, was adopted in the Legislature at San Jose, in 1851. Judge Marvin died many years ago. This law received the signature of John McDougald, Governor, familiarly known as "I John," the sweet poetess, Miss Irene McDougald, was his sister. "I John" had a noble, generous, genial and social nature, yet he met with a foe and was conquered. "The social glass," as with many of the earliest and bravest and best of California pioneers, found in poor McDougald a costly sacrifice, and it is remarkable enough that the chairman of the first committee on education in the above Legislature, Hon. E. Hydenfeldt, brother of the eminent Judge Solomon Hydenfeldt, followed precisely in the same sorrowful path of Governor McDougald. The first lips from which I heard a plea for common schools in the legislative halls of California were those of the ever lamented Broderick, over whose sacred dust sadly towers the highest column of Laurel Hill. Among early pioneers who gave friendly assistance in procuring school legislation, was the late Hon. John F. Swift, Senator Hearst, Hon. Frank Soule, the late Senator Sargent, Hon. Eugene Casserly, Hon. John Conness, and the Hon. John Foster, from San Diego. All of these honored and beloved pioneers have gone to their well-earned reward in the limitless and unknown beyond. That noble San Francisco citizen, Hon. John P. Buckley, who in 1849, with his own hands painted my sign, "First Public School," was struck by a recoiling rope at the launching of the first ironclad on the Pacific waters—the "Comanche." He fell back almost in my arms, and died soon after.

A Counterblast Against Garlic.

May the man who has cruelly murdered his life—
A crime to be punished with death—
Be condemned to eat garlic till he shall expire
Of his own foul and venomous breath!
What stomachs these rustics must have who can eat
This dish that Canidia made,
Which imparts to my colour a torturous heat,
And a poisonous look, I'm afraid.

They say that ere Jason attempted to yoke
The fire-breathing bulls to the plow,
He smeared his whole body with garlic—a joke
Which I fully appreciate now.
When Medea gave Glauce her beautiful dress
In which garlic was scattered about,
It was cruel and rather low-down, I confess,
But it settled the point beyond doubt.

On thirst Apulia ne'er has the sun
Inflicted such terrible heat;
As for Hercules' robe, although poisoned, 'twas fun
When compared with this garlic we eat!
Mæcenus, if ever on garbage like this
You express a desire to be fed,
May Mrs. Mæcenus object to your kiss
And lie at the foot of the bed!

—Horace's Third Epode.

In writing of the chorus girl, Heinrich Conreid says: "I believe the American takes the lead as a chorus girl. She looks better, is more intelligent, and understands her business thoroughly. The matrimonial chances of these girls are very good. I have known many of them to marry, and marry well. They generally wed outside the profession and leave the stage, and I fail to see why the chances of happiness for a man who marries a chorus girl should not be as good as those of a man who marries a woman in any other profession."

At a watering place in the Pyrenes the conversation at table turned upon a wonderful echo to be heard some distance off on the Franco-Spanish frontier. "It is astonishing," exclaimed an inhabitant of the Garonne. "As soon as you have spoken you hear distinctly the voice leap from rock to rock, from precipice to precipice, and as soon as it has passed the frontier the echo assumes the Spanish accent."

Lawrence Barrett was unable to wear a hat not made to order, though on one occasion he succeeded in finding a tolerable fit in John Fiske's when this clever, but absentminded philosopher walked off from Ole Bull's house in Cambridge with Barrett's brand new beaver, leaving a less enticing headgear in its place. The tragedian remained housed until his own hat was forthcoming.

Morton and Allen.

Vice-President Morton is known as a big, broad man with a copious heart as well as good brain capacity. A warm friendship exists between him and Congressman Allen, of Mississippi, the recognized wag of the House of Representatives.

One day in the heat of debate Allen took the floor to make a speech. The muse of poetry took possession of him and he proceeded and gave his conception of the national situation, as follows:

Wanny runs the Postoffice,
Levi runs the bar,
Baby McKee runs the White House
And d— it, here we are!

Allen had not yet met the Vice-President, and he had, so he says, some misgivings about it. He had the sensations of humiliation that most men experience after having been betrayed into doggerel, and he was in doubt as to the good taste of his reference to the temperance agitation about the restaurant in the Vice-President's building, The Shoreham.

As he was walking up Pennsylvania avenue to the Capitol he saw the Vice-President ahead of him with one of his (Allen's) friends. He walked more slowly, but they did likewise. Then he stopped and they also halted indicatively by their manner that they were waiting for him to overtake them. He went ahead, and was introduced to the Vice-President.

"I have heard of you," said the Vice-President affably, "and, by the way, let me congratulate you on your very clever rhyme."

It was off hand and showed a complete freedom from the petty ideas of dignity that so often infest the cerebra of public men, that it captivated the Congressman at once, and a total difference in political sentiments and traditions does not in any way interfere with the entertainment of a sincere personal regard.

A Family of Wife-Poisoners.

A remarkable story of poisoning comes from St. Petersburg, the alleged poisoners being the members of a well-to-do commercial family living at Orel. The family, whose wealth was chiefly accumulated by a succession of moneyed marriages, consisted of a grandfather, who had been thrice married; his son, who had had two wives, and a grandson, who had also been twice married. The first wife of the last mentioned died suddenly some time ago, and his second wife, whom he married shortly after his first wife's decease, died with equal suddenness recently. Suspicion having been aroused against the grandson, the bodies of his wives were exhumed, when it was discovered that both had died from the effects of poison. Suspicion then naturally fell upon the father and grandson, who had equally enriched themselves by their marriages, and an investigation of the circumstances of their wives' deaths is said to have proved beyond doubt that all of them were likewise poisoned.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

On Wednesday evening, May 20th, Herrmann, the eminent prestidigitateur, will give one of his famous entertainments. He is virtually "King of Magic" and master of the black art. Some new and startling sensations will be given by Prof. Hermann. He will be assisted by Mme. Herrmann and Abdul Khan, an Oriental fakir.

Kajanka commenced a season of three nights on Thursday. This is a very attractive spectacle, and in the cast some clever artists. The Mariposa dancers are nimble and high kickers. The Marlains are eight in number and assisted by Charles Ravel. They are graceful and wonderful acrobats. The little transformation dancer, Mlle Bertollo, a mere child, was the feature of the performance. Her personation of dancers of different nationalities captured the house. Kajanka again to-night.

Shenandoah will be the attraction on May 22d and 23d, at the Metropolitan. This exceedingly popular war drama has not lost any of its drawing qualities. The drama on this occasion is in the hands of the original Sheuandoh Company, which made such a success at the introduction of the play. While the company that presented Shenandoah here about a year ago was good, the original cast is far superior. We never tire of seeing "General Haverill," "Colonel West," "Gertrude Ellingham," "Madeline West," and the brave "boys in blue" at the front.

Hate in the Orchard.

At the end of July last the workmen employed at one of the chair-making works here were cutting up a large cherry tree at a circular-saw bench when something squirted into the sawyer's face and ran over the bench in all directions.

The engine was stopped and an examination showed that the saw had struck a cavity in the tree and liberated a considerable quantity of quicksilver, estimated at half a gallon.

The log was carefully examined and it was found that many years previously a hole had been bored in a slanting downward direction through the heart of the tree, the quicksilver poured in and the hole carefully plugged.

The rings of the tree showed that it was ninety years old, and that after the hole had been plugged the growth had covered the head of the plug with several inches of solid wood.

As it was known the tree came out of an old cherry orchard at Allerton, Yorkshire, where yearly a "cherry feast" used to be held, it was thought the quicksilver had been put in the tree in connection with some old ceremony, but later it was found that up to forty years ago quicksilver was thus employed to kill fruit or other trees by those who had "grudges" against their neighbors.

It was usual to do this in the dead of night. A piece of bark was first carefully taken off, the hole bored, quicksilver poured in, the hole plugged, and last, the bit of bark was carefully replaced.

The tree from the next spring of the sap began to wither. In the present case the attempt was a failure, for except where the quicksilver had lain (it had penetrated some inches beyond the end of the boring) the tree was sound.—Notes and Queries.

The Cause of Leprosy.

As far back as 1870 Armer Hausen discovered the bacillus of leprosy. Twenty years of investigation has confirmed the discovery. The bacillus, which very closely resembles the bacillus of consumption, is present in every form and variety of the disease. It is found in the solid tissues just beneath or in the deeper layers of the skin, and in the discharges from the open wounds. The question of how the infected germ is conveyed from one person to another is still being discussed, but it is probably conveyed in one or both of these two ways: either directly by contact or inoculation, or indirectly through food, water or the air.

Those who have made a special study of leprosy advocate the first view—that to catch the disease one must come in contact with a leper, and there must be a wound or a break in the skin through which the bacillus gains access to the system. To prove this a story is told of two children who were playing together, one of whom was in the first stage of leprosy, the stage of anesthesia or "no feeling." The leper boy drove a pin up to the head in the muscles of his thigh and said he felt no pain. His playmate, not to be outdone, took the same pin and drove it into his own thigh, and caught the disease by means of the bacilli carried by the pin from one boy to the other.

As long as the skin is perfectly sound there is no danger of contracting leprosy, even if a leper be handled, but let the skin be broken ever so little, then comes the danger. This is the reason why so few attendants and nurses in lepers' hospitals ever contract the disease, although they must necessarily come in contact many times daily with the patients. This explains why so many scientists claim that leprosy is not contagious and why the disease so seldom spreads.

Man and Wife are Two.

The Philadelphia Record, in commenting on a decision of a local Court, says:

The old maxim and the principle of the ancient law which declare that man and wife are one have been shattered by Judge Arnold, of Common Pleas Court No. 4, in an opinion handed down yesterday morning. The Judge, in treating upon the rights existing between husband and wife under the marriage law, takes occasion to distinctly throw down the old idea in the following words:

"The plaintiff claims witness' fees for his wife; the defendant objects; and hence this appeal. The question is new, because the law admitting husband and wife to testify for, but not against, each other is new. But in the few cases in which a party may be excluded from testifying, his wife is also excluded. This is not because of any supposed unity of husband and wife, for it is manifest that as witnesses they are two in number, but because of their identity of interest and the policy of the law. A husband joined for conformity in a suit by his wife prior to the married person's property act, of June 3, 1887, cannot recover witness fees, because he is a party. No one who is a party can have witness fees, whether he has an interest in the suit or not. The law now regards the unity of husband and wife as an obsolete legal fiction, and it has accommodated itself to that fact. The old rule of law that on a gift to a man and his wife and a third person, the man and wife together took only half the property, and the third person took the other half, is abolished by the modern legislation in regard to married persons. Each takes a third now. Statute laws recognize that husband and wife are two persons in substantial matters. The act of June 3, 1887, recognizes the customs and habits of the people, and declares these customs to be lawful. The common law was the customary law of the people, declared by the Judges. It was the best statesmanship, the faculty to observe what was needed and then to grant it. There was a time when husband and wife were one in the eye of the law. The husband on marriage took all his wife's horses, cattle, sheep and oxen. He could chastise her—moderately, say the books—but if he does it now he will be punished as a wife-beater. A wife was a helpmate indeed. She spun yarn, wove cloth, made frocks and breeches, and was generally merged into her husband's pocket, if not into his person. Women who bring out the spinning-wheels of their ancestors, or buy them if they have them not, exhibit a badge of woman's bondage. Now husband and wife wear clothes made and bought in stores. In olden time there were no bazaars and grand depots and establishments of smaller size in which all that is worn by man or woman can be bought. Formerly married women were under an actual disability to buy goods and make contracts; now they are not, except that the law of this State, in its transition state, still puts the burden on the storekeeper to prove and for Judges and juries to decide that the articles sold by him to the woman were necessary for her, overlooking the fact that the best judge of what is necessary for a woman, sound in mind, body and estate, is herself. Her disability in this respect is changed into a privilege to get and keep all she can, with an immunity from liability except for necessities. The next legislation will change this, no doubt, as it has been changed in England and nearly all the States. As there is no policy of law violated by allowing witness fees to a wife in a suit by her husband if she is a material witness, we think the allowance of her fees by the Prothonotary is proper in this case. Whether she was a material witness is a question for the taxing officer to determine. The affidavit of a party that a witness is material is not conclusive, but it may be overcome by proof. The materiality of testimony is always open to inquiry. Appeal dismissed."

A Mob That Nearly Lynched a Woman.

Thirty or forty years ago a New Orleans mob arose in behalf of a negro slave and undertook to avenge his cruel treatment. Not only this. They pursued and would have hanged the owner of the unfortunate slave. That owner was a beautiful woman, immensely wealthy, and the giver of sumptuous entertainments. The story is one of the most thrilling in the history of the city.

It was whispered that the lady in the case ill treated certain of her slaves, kept them chained in a dungeon and subjected them to starvation. She was, however, a woman of great wealth and influence, and managed to quiet these rumors. A fire occurred on her estate, whether started by slaves or not is not recalled. When citizens flocked to the place and began to tear down the burning building, the awful evidence of the maltreated slaves met their eyes. One of the poor creatures was chained. The fury of the mob was fearful. They besieged the palace of the beautiful woman, who, with unparalleled boldness, ordered her coachman to drive to her door, dressed in her most brilliant costume, and, with as much composure as if she were taking her usual evening drive, stepped in and directed the coachman to whip up his horses. The mob followed, but she distanced them. She managed to make one of the ships in the harbor and escaped to Paris.

An Unfair Advantage.

A dutiful husband wished to give his wife a handsome lace scarf for a present, and, to make sure of getting one to her liking, he asked her to buy one herself on the pretense that it was for a lady friend of theirs. The finest Honiton, Valenciennes and Brussels lace goods were spread out on the counter, but madame thought to herself:

"What is the use of spending so much money on a present for Amelie?"

Some embroidered lace was shown next. Even these were too dear. At length she selected a very plain and ordinary scarf.

"Quite good enough, too," she thought, and took it home to her husband.

"Have you chosen something pretty?" he asked.

"Oh, yes; very pretty."

"Is it just what you would have chosen for yourself?"

"The very thing."

"Then, my dear, you may keep it. I intended it for you!" exclaimed her husband, delighted with his little scheme. Curtain.

In the unbroken vision of the centuries all things are plastic and in motion; a divine energy surges through all; substantial for a moment here as a rock, fragile and vanishing there as a flower; but everywhere the same, and always sweeping onward through its illimitable channel to its appointed end. It is this vital tide on which the universe gleams and floats like a mirage of immutability; never the same for a single moment to the soul that contemplates it; a new creation each hour and to each eye that rests upon it. No dead mechanism moves the stars or lifts the tides or calls the flowers from their sleep; truly, this is the garment of Deity, and here is the awful splendor of the Perpetual Presence.

"WHO COMES HERE?"

"Halt! Who comes here?"
 "Friends with the countersign."
 "Advance one and give me the countersign!"

It was the relief going the rounds to change the pickets, and I was dropped out at post No. 7. We had fought Lee all day long on the strangest battle-field of the whole war—in the Wilderness. From right to left flank—from front to rear—we were hemmed in by forest and thicket. There were swamps in which lizards and serpents lurked, thickets in which the coy whippoorwill built its nest, dense spots of forest which seemed never to have echoed the ring of the woodman's ax.

We had fought from tree to tree, from thicket to thicket, from glade to glade, pushing back the gray lines here, baffled and compelled to give ground at other points. Lee's lines barred the way. Never a man in his whole army whose musket barrel was not hot that day. Never a man who did not feel that he was fighting for the life of the Confederacy.

How the forest shook and trembled as the great guns sent their deadly missiles crashing through the foliage! How the thickets blazed up in flames—the severed limbs crashed down—the sunny glades turned dark as night with the powder-smoke settling down! The dead outnumbered the bushes; the wounded wailed and cried as I never heard them before or after. There was something so sombre—so gruesome—so unearthly in fighting a foe unseen in the semi-darkness that the shouting and cursing usually heard in the lines gave place to silence and pale faces.

Darkness had come at last and the roar of battle had died away to a low growl. Grant had failed to drive Lee. We knew that from flank to flank. If he could not force a passage through those gray lines he could flank them. Before the sun went down we knew that he would do it. It was not yet night when the movement began, but my division would be one of the last to move, and we must hold our ground and prevent the Confederates from discovering what was taking place. It was a curious coincidence of war that Lee was also moving by the flank, both armies marching in parallel lines from a battle-field which had yielded neither victory nor defeat to either side.

Post No. 7 was under a large tree on the edge of a thicket. To the south there was a strip of open ground, then a thicket, then an old field, in which stood a log cabin. It was a lonely place, well away from the camps, the dead and the dying, but I was glad to be alone. All along the lines there was a growling of musketry; but this was but a bluff—a bit of acting to cover the real design. I had been nearly an hour on the post without anything happening to alarm me, when I heard a person moving in the thicket across the open strip.

Was it a person? Riderless horses had galloped about that day almost without number; this might be one which had found shelter in that thicket.

Rustle! Rustle! Step! Step!

It was a cautious movement. Whoever it was hoped to reach me without discovery, but there were dead leaves underfoot and the thicket was dense. A hare could not have moved without betraying its presence.

Rustle! Rustle!

Kneeling down so as to see under the darkness, as it were, I suddenly made out a black object against the dark background. It is neither horse nor mule; it is a human being. A scout from the enemy's picket post, only a quarter of a mile away? A wounded man hobbling about to find succor! One of our own scouts returning!

"Who comes here?"

There is silence for fifteen seconds, and then a woman's voice answers:

"I can't find the place! It is so dark I can't find the place!"

Aye! it was a woman's voice, and it had a sob in it, too. A woman there in the darkness between the hostile lines—with powder smoke still in the air, with stray bullets darting through the thickets with a whizz, as of some great insect stirred to anger!

"Who comes here?"

"I wish it wasn't so dark! I am so tired—so tired!"

And then she came across the open strip towards me, making no stop, never hesitating, walking straight up to me, as if she could see as well by night as in the sunshine of day.

"I can't find the place!" she sobbed, as she came to a stop within arm's length.

"Good God, woman! but what are you doing here?" I gasped, almost terrified at her presence.

"See! See!" she replied, holding a bundle out towards me. "One time I saw a beautiful spot in the woods, and said to myself that if he died I would bury him there, but I can't find it—I can't find it!"

"What is it, woman? What have you got there?"

"See! See! Don't be afraid. He's dead. He can't speak or move. Take him!"

She put a bundle into my arms and I cried out and let fall my musket. It was the body of a baby about a year and a half old. Dead? Yes! Dead from a cruel bullet which had pierced its little body and left a great wound which looked horrible to me in the dim light! Dead and cold and bathed in its own blood—dead for hours! And when I reached out and touched the shawl or wrap worn by the mother my fingers burned at the feel of blood!

"I have carried him such a long, long way," she moaned, "and I have seen so many dead men and heard so many guns! You'll help me, won't you—help me to find the place and bury poor baby?"

"Was it your baby? Did you live in the cabin beyond the thicket?" I asked, still holding the little corpse.

"He was so happy!" she said as she patted the little bare head with a motherly hand. "And I was so happy, too! He won't never laugh and cry again, will he? I've got to find that beautiful place and bury him, haven't I? And you'll help me; yes, I know you will, for you don't swear and curse at me."

She had lost her mind. Think of it—an insane mother wandering over a bloody battle-field with her dead child in her arms! She had but one idea—to bury it in a dell which she had once visited and remarked its beauty—a dell in which Federal or Confederate were doubtless then burying their own dead.

I knew not what to do. I could not leave my post, and I did not want her to go wandering further. I was trying to soothe and quiet the woman when she suddenly cried out:

"Ah! It is not so dark now and I can find the place. I'll go on ahead and dig the grave and do you follow on with baby. Poor baby! He won't know that he is buried, will he? I can find the place and you—"

"Come back! Come back!" I called to her as she fled away in the darkness, but she was two hundred feet away as she answered me:

"I'll find the place! Poor, poor baby!"

And when the relief came I told the story and pointed to the bundle resting on the ground beside me.

"God pity her!" whispered the Sergeant, as he lifted his cap.

"God pity her!" echoed all the others as they stood uncovered around the poor little corpse.

Time meant human lives that night. Grant was moving by the flank; Lee was moving by the flank to match him. The morrow was to witness more slaughter—make thousands of other widows and orphans.

"Dig here!" said the Sergeant, and with our bayonets we scooped out a shallow grave in scarcely more than a minute's time.

"Carefully, now! Poor little thing! Now fill in! That will do. God knows where it lies. Fall in—forward, march!"

And yet men write of the glory of war.—M. Quad in New York World.

The Eyes and the Races.

Eyes have always been regarded as a sure tribal characteristic. Tacitus, for example, describes the Germans as "fierce, with blue eyes and red hair." The Celts are mentioned as being swarthy-skinned and black-eyed; the Gauls are red-haired and light-eyed, while the Nubians, the Turks, the Egyptians and the Italians have always been spoken of as "the dark-eyed races." These peculiarities have not changed. Even to-day the people of the temperate zones have, generally, light-colored eyes, while those of the torrid and the frigid zones are usually dark, or even black. Of the races in particular, the only one that can be said to be "light-eyed" is the Caucasian, and even in this race the eyes are by no means uniform in point of color. The whole period of human history goes to prove that the light-haired, blue-eyed races are capable of the highest degree of civilization, but it does not by any means follow that the highest degree of civilization is confined to people of blonde complexion. There was a time when a blue-eyed person was rarely seen, and to-day seven-eighths of the world's inhabitants have dark eyes. Lavater, when discussing the eye as a feature in national physiognomy, gave the following as the results of his observations: "The Italians have small eyes; the Germans, light-colored eyes surrounded by many wrinkles; the English, strong, open, steadfast eyes; and the Swiss, eyes that are very dull-looking."

In a prominent German scientific journal called Prometheus occurs the following notable admission: To-day materialism is already a conquered standpoint. The exclusivism so common in modern scientific specialism is rejected. It has long since been recognized that natural science, philosophy and religious emotion can well exist and be cultivated together, and that the science of nature, however sure it may be of its own problems, retreats modestly to the rear whenever problems are proposed whose decision belongs, in the first instance, to human feeling. Thus, instead of ignoring a realm beyond the limits of science, it is distinctly accepted.

The alarming proportions of the water-melon crop in the south will not awaken any sectional discord. The north has no other feelings than those of fraternal regard for the rich and ruddy-blooded watermelons.

Do Beasts Have Souls?

There is much good argument in the literature of the world to prove that many of the most eminent scientists, theologians, philosophers and divines have believed in the immortality of the "beasts of the field." One of the earliest records of such a curious notion may be found in the pages of the Bible. See Ecclesiastes, third chapter, verses 18 to 21. In the verses named we find the following: "I said in my heart concerning the estate of the sons of men, that God might manifest them, and that they might see that they themselves are beasts. For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them; as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath; so that a man hath no pre-eminence above a beast. All go unto one place; all are of the dust, and unto dust all return. Who knoweth the spirit of the man that goeth upward, and the spirit of a beast that goeth downward to the earth?" In the above quotation Ecclesiastes does not positively declare that animals are to have a future existence, but he very plainly says that they have the same chances in that respect that the human family has. This was also the belief of John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, and of those eminent Christian Bishops, Jeremy Taylor and Bishop Butler. Coleridge advocated the same doctrine in England, Lamartine in France, and Agassiz in America. The last named gentleman, the greatest scientist we have ever had on this continent, and a man of profound religious convictions, was a firm believer in some future life for the lower animals. A professor at Harvard has completed a list of 185 European authors who have written upon the subject. Among the leading clergymen of this century who have publicly expressed their belief in a future life for animals are Joseph Cook and James Freeman Clark. At a recent trial a well known judge declared that one-half the human race believed in the same curious idea.

The Empress Eugenie, though naturally intelligent, was in some respects extremely ignorant. Educated as were the high-born young Spanish girls of her generation—that is to say, not educated at all—she was forced all through her palmy days to struggle against this great disadvantage. She never could learn the art of spelling, and all her private notes and letters are thickly peppered with faults of orthography. She ascended the throne at the age of twenty-six—a period in life rather late for the commencement of one's education. But to her credit be it said, she did her best by incessant reading, to supplement the defects in her early mental training. She spoke English to perfection, and the Emperor and she were wont to converse in that language when they did not want their attendants to know what they were talking about. She was an elegant and fearless horsewoman, and her skill in equestrian was among the first of her accomplishments that attracted the notice of Napoleon III, himself an accomplished rider. But her principal talent was for art, and she drew in crayon exceedingly well.

THE GOOSE, THE FROG AND THE FARMER.

A Goose, which had Wandered down to a Pond on her Owner's Estate, calculating to Paddle her own Canoe for a bit, Encountered a Frog as she entered the Water, and the latter at once sharply Accosted her with:

"How now, you Impudent Bird! How dare you enter this Pond without asking my Leave?"

"But this Pond was intended by my Owner for his Geese," replied the Fowl.

"Not much! It was left for us Frogs to Disport in."

"I must Deny the Allegation."

"And I insist!"

"Very well; here comes the Farmer, and We will leave it to him to Decide."

The Goose thereupon stated the Case in a clear and succinct manner, putting every Interrogation point in its Proper place, and the Farmer at once Replied:

"There is an abundance of room for both Geese and Frogs, but since you are inclined to Dispute and Quarrel I will remove the cause by removing the Pond."

And he went for a Spade and Dug a Ditch which ran off the Water to the last Drop, and left the Disputants looking at each other across the Mud.

Moral: He who grasps at too Much is pretty certain to Lose All.

THE MULE AND THE BEES.

Once upon a time a Young and Frisky Mule wandered away from its Mother's side towards a Hive of Bees, which the Farmer kept in order to procure Beeswax for the children to chew on. Observing his Tendency to Investigate, the Mother observed:

"Boy! You keep away from that Locality; Bees and Mules never have, and never will Agree."

The Youngster pretended to Submit, but at a Favorable Opportunity he cantered up for a close Investigation. He got an ear full in about half a Minute, and had not the Farmer and his son turned out to his Aid he would have been Stung to death. As it was he was Badly used up by the Sharp and Remorseless stings, and he was standing on Three Legs with his Eyes closed when his Mother drew near and queried:

"Did I not warn you against the Bees?"

"You did."

"Then why didn't you Heed my Words? I told you that the Bees and Mules did not Agree."

"So you did, but I went over to the Hive to ask them why it was."

Moral: Mules, always put confidence in your mother.

Don't Get Sea-sick.

Lemons, oranges, champagne—all these are recommended, says The Ladies' Home Journal, but the best recommendation, the most practical and common-sense, is to let the sea-sickness have its way, and then you are over with it. You can modify any possible attack by a little care as to diet a day or two before sailing, by avoiding greasy and rich foods, and this is wise. But don't go on board with the settled idea that you are going to be sick. Dismiss the thought. Keep on your feet the first day out. Walk up and down the deck continuously. By this method you get accustomed to the motion of the ship, tire yourself out, and, if you are any sort of a sleeper, you will sleep soundly the first night. Then the worst is over. But if not, and you do get sick, just accept it philosophically. Of course, you will feel miserable. But, let the spell run its course, and it is done. And you are better for it, and certainly wiser than to try and cure it by a mixture of things, which only give the stomach a reason for a continuance of proceedings. One of the leading medical authorities in the world, says that fifteen grains of sulphate of quinine, administered two hours, or four hours at most, before embarking, will completely free even sensitive subjects from the horrors of sea-sickness.

In a certain passage, Æschylus reports it of the Persians that they were routed on the shore of Lake Strymon. Thereupon, being obliged either to pass over the ice then ready to thaw or else be cut in pieces by their vectors, though before they held, or at least pretended to hold, that there was no God; yet then they fell on their knees and prayed to God that the ice might bear them. Nor is this to be wondered at, since all men by nature seem to have a secret acknowledgment of an invisible power that is able either to help or to hurt them, which is, perhaps, as Robert South remarks, the first rude draught or original seed of the persuasion of a Deity. And it is this (often unconscious) conviction that drives men in a great strait to rely upon and plead for more assistance than they see, and to extend their hope further than their senses. Our instincts are often wiser than our reason. The heart is a better and more trustworthy logician than the head. Intuition is reason in its essence and separated from its processes. We know more than we can explain. Shakespeare makes Hamlet wisely say: "There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in your philosophy." Faith is reason extended beyond the seen and above the temporal—reason etherealized and sublimed.

Laughing Ghosts.

The Chattanooga correspondent of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat tells the following ghost story:

Ghosts, solemn, unearthly and terrible, can be found in the old-time cabins in the mountains of East Tennessee, and almost every gorge and cave has its tale of horror. Hideous hobgoblins, the spirits of murderers and their hapless victims, can be seen in various places, but on a recent trip through Polk county I found what was to me a new species of ghost. Riding through the fastnesses of this remote region I lost my way, and night overtook me while still in a rocky gorge, miles from human habitation.

Suddenly I heard a laugh—a merry, hearty laugh—which, as it echoed back from the rocks, brought joy into my heart, for here was a companion, and there was something in the voice which inspired me with confidence. Soon it was repeated, and peal after peal of laughter resounded from a cove near by. I thought it was a party of hunters camping out and having a merry time. I turned my horse and rode into the cove. The voices were just ahead of me, and I hastened to join them. Then they sounded behind me, and I knew that I had passed the party. There was no tent, nor was there any camp-fire, and I had a strange sense as of being in the midst of a crowd, and yet not a human being was visible. Soon the laughter was all around me—in front of me, behind me, and on either side. It seemed as if there were people on every side and within a few feet of me, and yet no one was visible. My horse trembled with fear, and although tired from his long journey, became unmanageable and started on a run for the mouth of the cove. I could not account for it, and when the voices had died away in the distance my feelings were strangely elated, as though I had escaped from some great evil.

Finally I reached a cabin, and the kind-hearted mountaineer arose from his bed when I knocked and gave me a welcome to his humble home. The next morning I told my adventure, and the story was told to me as follows:

Many years ago a party of gay young people camped in this gorge, having a good time hunting and fishing. Days passed into weeks and weeks into months, and still they never returned. Parties were formed and a thorough search made, but no tidings were ever received from the missing sportsmen. How or where they met their fate is not known, but they never returned, and since that time the merry laughter of the huntsmen can be heard in the lonely gorge as though they were still frolicking at the camp-fire as they did in the days of the long ago when they were lost among the rocks.

The Obituaries were Probably in Type.

A reporter called at the house of a prominent city pastor who had been down with pneumonia. His wife answered the door bell.

"How is the doctor?"

"Much better, thank you."

A shade of disappointment mirrored itself on the reporter's face, and he said in a tone which showed that he felt aggrieved as one who had been robbed of a sensational item: "Well, they told me at the office that the Rev. Mr. B— was at the point of death and that your husband was very low. I've just called at Rev. Mr. B—'s and I find he's got well and gone out. And now you tell me your husband is better," sighing. Then, with a hopeful look, he asked quickly: "Is there any likelihood of a relapse?"

"Mercy," cried the frightened wife, "I hope not!"

"Good morning, then," said the sad reporter.

The American who goes to the parliament house is surprised to see the commons and lords sitting with their hats on. The hat worn is invariably the "stovepipe" or "plug." An English M. P. in anything but a high hat would create a greater sensation than the appearance of a Jerry Simpson's feet, sockless upon the top of his desk in the house. Our English friends have some very queer customs handed down to them through the ages, and it will be worth while to read ex-Speaker Reed's comments thereon. For instance, when a member comes into parliament he carries his hat in his hand, but on sitting down he puts it upon his head. If a member wishes to speak he takes off his hat and holds it in his hand; if he wants to make a long speech he puts his hat on the bench, though he does not remove it until he has been recognized by the speaker. But if he wishes simply to make a motion or ask a question he keeps his hat on his head.

The Apache Indians' religious belief prevents them from committing murder in the dark. If a dozen Apaches should discover a man sleeping by his campfire at night no amount of money would hire them to attack him until the sun came up. They believe that if they kill a man at night their own souls will walk in eternal darkness forever. Knowing this curious superstition, hunters, scouts, trappers and others traveling through the Apache nation move about during the night and lay by in some safe retreat during the day.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of J. C. Bainbridge, an insolvent debtor. J. C. Bainbridge having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said J. C. Bainbridge is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the county of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal of the said debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the county of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court room of said Court, on the 19th day of June, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M., of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the county of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. Dated, May 11th, 1891.

W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge of the Superior Court. WM. A. GETT, JR., Attorney for Petitioner.

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to Helen A. Grant, Allen D. Grant, Edward N. Grant, Catherine Matzen, Mary M. Miller, John Doe, and Richard Roe, greeting.

You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the county of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 29th day of January, 1891, in which action EDWARD DIETERLE is plaintiff and you are defendants.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: The said action is brought for the purpose of quieting the title to that certain piece or parcel of land situated, lying and being in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, and State of California, and described according to the plan of said city, as the south twenty (20) feet of the west sixty-eight (68) feet of lot number one, in the block bounded by J and K, and 5th and 6th streets; for the purpose, also, of determining all adverse claims of the said defendants to said property; and for a decree of said Court, declaring and adjudging that the title of plaintiff to said premises is good and valid, and that neither the said defendants have, nor any of them has, any estate or interest in the same; and forever enjoining and debarring the said defendants, and each of them, from asserting any claim to said land adverse to plaintiff, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made.

And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do herewith set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court this 20th day of February, A. D. 1891.

Gotham's Justice.

The New York police courts furnish many amusing expositions of the manner in which justice may or may not be dispensed by a magistrate whose short-comings are more than overbalanced by a strong political pull. Justice is a sadly bedraggled jade when the morning trial hour arrives, and "his honor" finds himself still suffering from the effects of the previous night's carousing with "the boys." His temper as well as his judicial wisdom and philanthropy—if he ever possessed these last named attributes commonly supposed to be part and parcel of a judge's mental make-up—are more often than not greatly influenced by the political or domestic atmosphere last breathed by him. Under such conditions Astrea is very apt to be shown to a back seat. Among such cases as are, in the light of the law, regarded as trivial, "drunks" are the most common. For cases of intoxication and the like, the little Rhadamanthuses of Gotham's police courts have as a rule some method more or less habitual, while grave felonies destined for the higher courts, are of course treated with uniform care. But withal a great deal of swing is permitted to the temper of the justice, and its gyrations are at different times humorous, pitiful or shameful. In mercantile houses men are accustomed to seeing the spirit of the day's business affected by the mood of the chief; but it would seem as if the business routine in a court of justice should be free from personal distempers. After all, however, police magistrates are only human, extremely human, and it may be we should not expect to find unflinching equanimity and dignity even in police courts.

At times his honor is in gleeful, humane and lenient mood, and doles out his penalties with facetious advice, or receives testimony with flippant comment. Again it is too plainly shown that a sentence is severe because of personal prejudice behind the judicial bar, or perhaps merely because some private affairs have caused ill nature. Frequently, too, a justice, either tacitly or openly, gives expression to his opinion before all evidence is in. These are all "breaks" on the part of the Court with regard to which he depends upon the good will of the newspaper men that they do not become public. As good feeling and friendliness usually exist between the reporters and the judge, these small blunders are ignored. It is only when some serious miscarriage of justice occurs that the public is given an opportunity to call its minister to account. But are these "little breaks" so inconsequential and harmless? They are certainly not as infrequent as they might be.

The "Foreign Subject."

This Italian question reminds me of the "foreign subject" imposture, as it was practiced in this country during the war, says a writer in Open Court. When the draft was ordered, regiments of patriots who for years had been conspicuous as lustlers and knock-downers at the polls, marched gallantly up to the office of the provost marshal and claimed exemption on the ground that they were "foreign subjects" of all sorts of emperors, kings and queens. They owed allegiance to every flag under the sun, excepting the American flag, and they "demanded" that their names be stricken from the lists. Public-spirited fellows, long eminent for skill in that branch of civil engineering which directs caucus machinery, swarmed at the consulates clamoring for safety. In comic paradox appeared Hungarians invoking the aid of Austria, Poles appealing to Russia, and fierce Fenians demanding the protection of the British flag. What is more wonderful still, they got it. The consul knew that the United States could not afford to quarrel with other nations then, and with an air of imperious dictation they required that those "foreign subjects" be released from liability to service in the army. Some of those very same non-combatants went back to the old country, and when arrested for political offenses there, declared themselves to be citizens of the United States, claiming the protecting of the American flag; and what is most wonderful of all, got it.

The Dead Poet.

Theodore de Banville, like M. Octave Feuillet, was a survivor from the manlier "romantic" generation. He was not, of course, one of the men of the first harvest—not a contemporary and fellow-worker of Dumas and Hugo. He came with the second crop—that is to say, he was a pupil and follower of the great men. Like many others of his own generation, he could see and laugh at the mere extravagances, the storm and stress of the early romantic writers. But if he laughed it was with affection and understanding. He sucked what was best from the revolt against the hidebound and mechanical classicism of the "days before the flood." He helped to complete the emancipation of French poetry from the pedantry of the Boileau school. No man in his time understood the structure of French verse better or has written on it more acceptably. Though he was excelled by many contemporaries in native force and creative faculty, he was a master workman and had the good fortune to do his work before French literature was invaded by the prevailing fog of "pessimists" and other bores.

Gotham was a happy name that Washington Irving applied to the great Knickerbocker city of New York. As this is the center of all the great American attractions, and to which every newspaper looks for enlightenment upon cosmopolitan life, it is necessary to have some one at this center who has the experience and tact to catch the many events that afford interesting reading and information to the general public even in the far off west. There are few adapted to this business, but we have found one who is an adept in reproducing Gotham events and experiences, and who is a skillful newspaper correspondent. Hereafter we will present to our readers weekly one of his unique and graphic pictures of Gotham life and experiences.

"The People's Party of the United States" is the outcome of the Farmer's Alliance Convention held in Cincinnati this week. The platform of the new party is broad and emphatic, demanding the free and unlimited coinage of silver, the passage of laws prohibiting the alien ownership of lands, national control and supervision of public communication and transportation, and the election of President and Senators by a direct vote of the people. A National Central Committee was appointed to represent the new party at a national conference, to be held February 22, 1892, for effecting coalition with all the reform organizations and to hold a national convention June 1, 1892, to nominate candidates for President and Vice President of the United States. The name of Jeremiah Simpson—otherwise the "Sockless Statesman"—nowhere appears in the proceedings of the convention. However, that gentleman, to whose individual efforts the Farmers' Alliance is directly traceable, will represent thirty-seven of the distinctively agricultural counties of Kansas in the next Congress, and will exert a potent influence in mapping out the preliminary work of organization in the ranks of the new People's Party.

It is well enough to remark that the public estimate of Jerry Simpson is far from correct. He is by no means the sort of person that his nickname would imply. An adventurer could hardly rise to eminence in the community that he represents—a majority of the population consisting of the overflow of the native stock of the best of the older States. In 1880 Kansas contained 106,000 persons who were natives of Illinois, 77,000 Indianans, 55,000 Iowans, 32,000 Kentuckians, 60,000 Missourians, 93,000 Ohioans, 60,000 Pennsylvanians, 42,000 New Yorkers, a total of 53,000 New Englanders, and about 73,000 from Wisconsin, Michigan, Tennessee and Virginia. The total foreign-born population was 110,000 as against 233,000 natives of the State. Eight hundred and eighty-three thousand of her people out of a little less than a million were born in the United States; nearly four-fifths of her people were natives of the Northern States. Speaking relatively, there has been no change in conditions in the last ten years. We state these facts for the purpose of showing that Kansas is an unpromising locality for the breeding of demagogues. Jerry Simpson is a man of great force of character, of good address and a great store of half-digested knowledge—just such a person as might be expected to be thrown to the surface by a political convulsion.

This article has no reference to persons or political parties, being an examination of the Land-Loan-Public-Warehouse-Sub-Treasury scheme as an economic proposition. The public debt report of Treasury Secretary Foster shows that at the end of last month the bonds that were issued to the various subsidized railroads, for the payment of which the government became responsible, amounted in round numbers to $64,000,000, and that the interest which the government has paid on such bonds, and which the railroad corporations have not repaid, amounts to $63,000,000 more. The direct and contingent liability of six railroad corporations to the government is $127,000,000. In other words, the government has paid $63,000,000 as interest for the roads and has agreed to pay $64,000,000 of bonds in case the roads fail to pay it. The amount of the bonds of the Central Pacific railroad is $25,000,000, on which the government has paid $28,000,000, exclusive of all payments made by the company. The bonds of the Union Pacific amount to $27,000,000, the interest which the government has paid, and for which the corporation is liable, amounting to $24,000,000.

These two corporations have had the benefit of the credit of the government for nearly thirty years to the extent of $52,000,000, and in the meantime the government has paid $52,000,000 more, as interest on its own credit, for the benefit of these two corporations. Together the two corporations have paid about $13,000,000 by allowing the government the use of their roads for transportation purposes, and about a million in cash, and now have a little the rise of $13,000,000 in bonds and cash in the sinking fund. It will thus be seen that the two corporations have had the use of a great sum of money over a long period of time at a very low rate of interest, as a consequence of which they have acquired vast properties, and established solid credit, every member of either corporation becoming a millionaire in the meantime.

The time being near at hand when the corporations would have to meet their obligations, it became necessary to devise plans for postponing the day of payment and reducing the rate of interest. The plan proposed was to defer the day of payment fifty or a hundred years, consolidate the principal of the bonds and the interest which has been paid by the government, issue new bonds and fix the interest rate at not above two per cent. per annum. In order, however, to reconcile the public to a scheme of this sort, it was necessary to direct the opinion of the country in a channel favorable to it. When one has made up one's mind to loot the money chest of another, the best way to get helpers in the enterprise is to agree to divide the plunder with them. The farmers being the most opposed to the plan of the railroad corporations, it was necessary to buy their peace by inaugurating a scheme whereby they might loot the treasury themselves, or get money at a low rate of interest, which they might pay or not as they pleased, which amounts to the same thing. It was necessary also to divert the agricultural mind from the plans of the railroad corporations, so it was set upon the tariff protected manufacturers. So the wise men behind the scheme for extending the time of payment of the railroad debt and for reducing the interest rate thereon, said to the farmer: "Look there! See Mr. Carnegie; how he makes a big lot of money every year by manufacturing steel, being protected by a tariff tax of from 47 to 93 per cent. See also that blanket-maker; how he is growing rich under tariff protection.

Now, we want to even you up with Mr. Carnegie and the blanket-maker. We can't make your wheat or corn or cotton or tobacco worth more than it is by an Act of Congress, but we can compel the government to lend you money to the extent of half the value of your land at an interest rate not above two per cent. a year. An abundance of money at a low rate of interest will operate in your favor just as the protective tariff operates in favor of Mr. Carnegie and the blanket-maker, and by and by you'll own a castle in Scotland yourself, and have a coach with four gray horses, and outriders and liveried footmen." So the farmer, having his eyes fixed on Mr. Carnegie and the blanket-maker, and the prospect of plenty of cheap money, fell right into the trap, and went out and called in his neighbors and instituted the Farmers' Alliance, of which statesman Jerry Simpson is first prophet.

In the meanwhile the gentlemen who are anxious to have the time for the payment of the railroad debt extended, and the interest rate thereon reduced, are maturing their plans and gaining friends without molestation. This paper has nothing to do with the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the plan to refund and extend the date of payment of the railroad debt; we are merely showing how that scheme led to the formation of the Farmers' Alliance organization, and to the exploitation of all the observed propositions therewith connected—and how the farmers are willing to let the railroad people have their way, provided they are evened up with Mr. Carnegie and the blanket makers.

Leland Stanford and Senator Zebulon Benoni Vance, of North Carolina, are joint authors of the Land-Loan-Public-Warehouse-and-Sub-Treasury scheme; that is, Stanford is the patentee of the land-loan part of it, and Vance is the patentee of the public warehouse part, while the two are joint patentees, or tenants in common, so to speak, of the sub-treasury part.

It was this way: The farmers of the northwest, notably those of Kansas and Nebraska, saw that the Central Pacific and Union Pacific companies had been using the credit of the government to the extent of $52,000,000 in bonds for twenty-seven years, in addition to which the government had advanced $52,000,000 more as interest during the same period—they saw also, that in return for these advantages the companies had repaid in cash only a little over a million, and had put $13,758,000 into the sinking fund, of which only $18,000 was in cash, the remainder consisting of retired bonds. We say that, seeing all this, the farmers of the northwest did not take kindly to a proposition which would give the two corporations the use of all this money—$104,000,000—for a further period of fifty or a hundred years, upon the payment of interest at the rate of two per cent. a year. It was to meet and allay this wide-spread feeling of discontent that Senator Stanford brought forward his land-loan scheme.

It happens, however, that there are a great many people throughout the country who follow farming as an occupation who do not own the land that they till. This is notably the case in the south—perhaps a third of the cotton crop and a fourth of the tobacco crop are raised on rented land. Probably five-sevenths of the negro farmers are renters. So, it being highly desirable that the landless farmers should have their share of cheap money, Senator Zebulon Benoni Vance brought in his public warehouse and sub-treasury bill.

When combined, the schemes of Stanford and Vance comprehend the following provisions: Every land-owner and the owner of every town lot may require the government to lend him an amount of money equal to one-half the value of his realty, exclusive of improvements, at two per cent. interest per year, the loan to run for twenty years. The government shall erect, at its own expense, as many warehouses as shall be necessary for the storage of non-perishable farm products, such as corn, cotton, tobacco, wheat and the like. The farmers are to have the free use of these repositories wherein to store their products. Upon their products, so stored, the farmers may compel the government to loan them an amount of money equal to eighty per cent. of the value thereof, at two per cent. interest per year. In case the land-owner or the storer of farm products does not repay his loan or redeem his pledge, as the case may be, the government becomes the owner of the land or of the products constituting the pledge.

This is the genesis of the Land-Loan-Public-Warehouse-Sub-Treasury scheme. It is also a fresh illustration of how a brace of strange bell-wethers can lead an innumerable flock of sheep in one direction. If the government should be lenient with millionaires in the matter of requiring the repayment of money loaned, how much more urgent would the occasion be for being forbearing with poor farmers and debt-burdened tenants. In this view of the matter, when would pay-day be likely to arrive?

The outcome of the Farmers' Alliance movement may be what it may, the result of the confusion into which public opinion will have been thrown will be that the railroad people will get all they want. We repeat and emphasize the declaration, that we are not attempting to treat of the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the scheme of the railway companies—we are merely showing how the judgment of apparently sane people may be loosed from its moorings and led to embrace the most absurd economic fallacy that has ever been brought forward in the history of the country.

Let us suppose, as a matter of speculation, the Stanford-Vance scheme to be in actual operation. What sort of state of affairs would exist? It is always presupposed, in this country at least, that changes that may be made in economic or fiscal policies are designed to improve the condition of the working people. There are twenty-three millions of people in this country that follow some kind of steady labor for a living. There are two millions and a half of marriagable young women that are not included in this list. Of the twenty-three million working people mentioned, at least one-half—eleven millions, say—are landless; neither do they rent estates for the purpose of farming. They are the mudsills of the land—they run the farms, the factories, and the railroads; they bear the State on their shoulders, yet not one of them acquires any interest in the products of his toil. How would this numerous and deserving class derive any benefit from the Stanford-Vance scheme? What have these burden-bearers to pledge to the government as security for a loan of money? Still, are they not deserving of recognition by the hand of bounty?

Now, suppose a case: For the sake of illustration, without attempting to be entirely accurate, let us say that every healthy man between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-three is worth three thousand dollars to the State; that his expectancy of life would enable him to add that much to the permanent wealth of the nation. Now, suppose that statesman Jerry Simpson should insist that the convention which is to meet in 1892 should adopt this proposition as a part of its policy: that the government shall issue to those eleven millions of landless and propertyless working people paid up insurance policies on their lives, and then lend to each of them an amount of money equal to eighty per cent. of the amount for which his life is insured. You would probably say that statesman Jerry Simpson was as daft as a person could well be. But if Stanford and Vance are right, would Jerry Simpson deserve such a severe judgment as that? Does not the Stanford-Vance plan contemplate giving to those that have and withholding from those that have not? Might it not be that the have-nots are as deserving as those that have? Seeing that they have created, or have at least added to the value of the possessions of those that have; that without them six figures would have to be stricken from the numerals that denote our national wealth, does not the Stanford-Vance plan for handing around cheap money contemplate mean treatment of this patient and deserving class of our population?

Another point is this: The plan that Stanford and Vance have brought forward is the most vicious piece of class legislation that was ever proposed. Having given the wheat-grower, the tobacco farmer and the cotton planter eighty per cent. of the value of their crops, with what show of reason could we refuse Jay Gould or Collis P. Huntington a loan on the plant and equipments of their vast railroad systems? The National Whisky Trust has 180,000 barrels of whisky in bonded warehouses at this very moment—an article whose quality and commercial value increase with age. Suppose the whisky distillers should ask for a loan? If we intend to conduct business on a reasonable basis, we should have to let them have the money.

Nevertheless, the eleven millions of working people, with hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of labor stored up in their bodies, would be turned away because they have nothing to pledge as security.

We ought to be just all around in this money-lending business. The young women—the child-bearers of the land—ought to receive their share. The young women ought to be put on an even footing with the whisky distillers and the tobacco planters. If the Stanford-Vance plan ever comes up in Congress again, THEMIS has an amendment to offer to the effect following: Every unmarried woman, between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five years, shall be entitled to a loan of $6,000, the principal and interest of which shall be repaid in children, at the rate of $1,500 per child.

We received recently from Senator Stanford the supplement to the Congressional Directory, which gives a list of the counties in the 44 States of the Union and the boundaries of the Congressional Districts. It contains interesting data. The population of the United States and Territories is 62,622,250, and California is credited with a population of 1,208,130. New York leads with a population of 5,997,853, and Pennsylvania follows with 5,258,014. Nevada is the lowest in the list, having a population of but 45,761. The number of counties in the States is 2,633. Texas bears the palm of having the greatest number of counties—245, and Delaware the least number, only 3. In the New England and Middle States the numbers of the counties are small when the comparison is made with the States of the South and West and those newly admitted. The great State of New York has but 60 counties, and in very many of them there are more people than are in some other States. The State of Delaware, for instance, has a population of 168,493. Montana, Wyoming, Nevada and Idaho have less. The population of each of three counties in New York is largely in excess of that of Delaware, and in most of the sixty it exceeds that of Nevada.

It is noticeable that in most of the States the naming of counties has been largely given in honor of distinguished individuals, and particularly to the Presidents of the nation. The name of Washington is borne by 30 counties in as many different States; Adams has 9; Jefferson, 23; Madison, 19; Monroe, 15; Jackson, 22; Van Buren, 4; Harrison, 8; Tyler, 2; Polk, 12; Taylor, 7; Fillmore, 2; Pierce, 5; Buchanan, 2; Lincoln, 18; Johnson, 12 (there is no doubt, however, that many of these 12 counties were named after individuals of local note); Grant, 11; Garfield, 5; Arthur, 1; Cleveland, 2. The names of statesmen have also been perpetuated in the county names. The name of Clay is borne in 17 States, that of Calhoun in 10, of Lee in 9, of Benton in 7, and of Webster 7. Blaine, Greeley and Fremont also appear in the new States.

In Alabama the names of the counties are mainly from men of the olden time, and a few of the names are of Indian origin. The same can be said of most of the Southern and Western States. In California our county names are mostly of Spanish or Indian derivation. Humboldt, Kern, Lassen, Marin, Glenn and Sutter were named from individuals. The county names in the New England States are decidedly English, and largely follow the sub-territorial designations of the old country. Texas seems to have been in a strait to select names for some of its many counties. We find one called Deaf Smith, another Jack, another Jeff. Davis, another Maverick, another Tom Green and another Titus.

It is part of the human composition to indulge in dreams and speculations—not only for the future on this earth, but the great hereafter. The poorest and most unfortunate of mankind, lets his fancy wander and builds ethereal castles, just the same as the most favored. The Creator made us dreamers and visionaries. We are so constituted that we must per force accept some of the so-called vagaries. Many believe in the transmigration of souls; others that there is a ruling spirit on earth for each individual which guards and controls his or her action through life, and takes charge of the soul when the mortal bond is severed. But after all, are we not too busy on this earth to waste our substance and vex our spirit in considering such matters? These abstract notions do not aid us in securing employment, or in gaining for us our daily bread and the usual luxuries that the good old earth produces for us. It may be interesting to think and dream of the series of individual existence, and that we may continue to live through unnumbered ages hereafter, becoming more and more etherealized and spiritualized as we advance through the great and, to us, unfathomed realms of the universe. The usually level-headed fellow looks out for the present needs, and takes life as it comes with its joys and woes. Of course, there is a preference for the joys. Yes, we are too much engaged in looking after Number 1 on this earth to be greatly concerned in the vagaries of transcendental cranks, or extremely orthodox advocates. There may be a trifle of irreverence in this, but it is not such that will offend the great Creator; it is only irreverence of those who assume to be his agents on earth. The religious enthusiast may speak of being "conscious of immortality, but how can one have a present consciousness of a supposed future—of something that does not exist?"

The "third party" manifesto has been issued. The threadbare title so long invoked by those who have failed to use the great national organizations for their isms and ultras—"The People's Party"—has been adopted as the name of the "third party." It is not a good omen for these wonderful reform organizations to begin with an olio of song and music. While there was a certain kind of enthusiasm, at the late convention, it was evident the great spirit of genuine patriotism was not present. That platitudes, that taxation shall not be used to build up one interest or class at the expense of another, is so venerable and so meaningless we wonder even at this convention utilizing it; there is no party that has ever favored such a scheme as that against which this thunderbolt has been launched. There is considerable "resolootin'" against railroads, which is always a most fruitful source of invective by all would-be reformers. The election of President and Senators by direct vote of the people is not new, and certainly not a cause for revolt against the old parties. All parties are in favor of limiting the revenue to the expenses of the government, so there is nothing of reform in this precept. Equal rights to all men is fundamental and part of the Declaration of Independence, and our reformers cannot very well improve on that document. The restriction of alien ownership of lands is another principle that has been a tenet of both the national parties. The great plank in the "third party" platform is our Republican Senator's Land-Loan bill, which is certainly not the property of the "third party." Free coinage of silver is not the exclusive property of the "third party," nor is it likely to cause a deflection from the great national parties. Taking it all in all, there has been no just reason shown why a third party is necessary; the issues presented by the platform do not divulge any reforms not already embraced in the tenets of the old parties. There were no great minds in the convention; no one was endowed with the brain power to originate anything, or even to suggest a plank that the most ardent "reformer" could enthuse upon.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Theodore Bromley is engaging some good people to form a company to play with Minna Gale next season. Miss Gale is about to enter the list of stars.

James O'Neill and Louis James are two excellent actors, and they have an opportunity of showing their skill in The Envoy, but not to the extent to display the best they can do.

Tschaikowsky, the Russian composer, who is at work on a new opera which he hardly expects to complete inside of two years, says: "The labor of composing is slow, and I never attempt to do anything in a short time. I am sometimes a month doing what most modern composers accomplish in ten minutes. I cannot work rapidly, or at any time except when in the mood."

The adventuress and the roue have too much to say in the modern drama. Their stage work is out of all proportion to their life work. There is a tiresome supererogation in straining for two hours and a half to get them "rounded up," when we know perfectly well that in life they will round themselves up, and we've paid the police to relieve us of the annoyance of watching them. NYM CRINKLE.

Isabella Coe has added to her already well established reputation as an artist this season by her admirable performances of "Mrs. Brown" in Dr. Bill and Barbara. Miss Coe's interpretation of both characters was entirely different from those of her predecessors. The same sweet, sympathetic charm and manner which were observable as the "Schoolmarm" in A Midnight Bell, and the humor and dash with which she invested the "Widow" in A Gold Mine, were exercised in her later characterizations. There is a magnetic charm about Miss Coe's interpretation of any character with which she is in perfect sympathy that is very noticeable. There are few more capable and versatile actresses on the American stage.

The magician Houdin had one of the most wonderful local memories ever known. He could go into a room, turn round and walk out immediately without even pausing, but from the brief glance he took of his surroundings he could mention and afterwards describe every article of interest in the apartment. His memory was not a natural gift, but the result of careful training. He and his son would practice every day by walking past a show-window filled, for instance, with toys and notions. They would go rapidly by, each taking a single glance, and after they were past would stop and compare notes as to what they had seen. So expert did they become in this exercise that either would frequently be able to give the names and describe the position of forty or more articles seen in the window at a single glance, and Houdin used to say that the triumph of his life in this line was the enumeration of sixty-three articles which he remembered having seen as he passed the window of a jewelry store on Broadway, New York.

We can never quite rid ourselves of the conviction that the forlorn maiden ought to be won in the last act, and the estranged wife gathered to her repentant husband's bosom. It is of no account that the French tutors, from De Stael to Sardou, remind us it is not that way in real life. Our hearts answer: "Well, that's the way it ought to be. We do not go to the theatre for the accurate representations of the world we leave behind us. For in the world religion and science and law cannot quite rectify these aberrations. But art can." How lastingly lifting were those old dramas in which the hero achieved everything. We forgave the bravado and even the bathos, and in our solidarity we never outgrew "Claude Melnotte." How uninspiring are those modern dramas in which the hero is only a victim of circumstances, and whines about the inevitable, and dies according to the latest hospital study, in proper pessimistic futility! So long as the stage was content to be romantic the world was lifted a little by its bugle summons. It was something to picture endeavor, dauntless courage and success. To make us more romantic was the best thing it could do. To make us more doubtful and despairing is the worst thing it can do. NYM CRINKLE.

Fanny Davenport writes as follows to the New York World: The talents required for the successful actress' career would adorn a queen's drawing-room. I am fully aware that there are cases of immorality on the stage. The same applies to society in general. These cases of immorality upon the stage, when discovered, are published far and wide. The telegraph is used to spread them from one end of the country to the other. People somehow seem to gloat over them, and they furnish strength to the argument of the corruption of the stage. On the other hand, the lapses from virtue outside the stage are carefully concealed. The records of divorce courts for the sins of people in private life are not public property. If a comparison were made I fear would think the stage would not suffer in numerical calculation. I admit that there are strong temptations for a girl to err upon the stage. The old ideas of separating an actor from his fellow men on the ground that his calling is degraded—ideas born of an ignorant, brutal age—still exist. Upon the young and comely, talented and winsome girl adopting the stage as a profession, the eyes of lust are fixed as upon a shining mark. She needs all the remembrance of a mother's early pious teaching, all the strength of her own character, to resist the allurements placed before her. Her reward for such resistance is all the more meritorious.

Book Chat.

The word "preface," used in the beginning of books, was originally a word of welcome to a meal, and was equivalent to "much good may it do you."

"My thoughts are with the dead; with them
I live in long-past years;
Their virtues love, their faults condemn;
Partake their hopes and fears;
And from their lessons seek and find Instruction with a humble mind."—Southey.

Lord Tennyson has gone into the dairy business. Now we shall have not only the "poetry of silence" and the "poetry of motion" that people are constantly writing about, but also the "poetry of milk." It is presumed that Lord Tennyson sells his milk by the meter, rather than the quart.

We read "In Darkest England" and "How the Other Half Lives"—two books that every thoughtful man and woman ought to read, and read carefully—and we find a state of things pictured in those pages which has no counterpart in this town. What we want is that these wretched conditions shall never have any counterpart here.

No man is born into the world whose work
Is not born with him; there is always work
And tools to work withal for those who will;
And blessed are the horny hands of toil!
The busy world shoves angrily aside
The man who stands with arm akimbo set
Until occasion tells him what to do;
And he who waits to have his task marked out
Shall die and leave his errand unfulfilled.—Lowell.

It has been said that a person may be more truly judged by the books and papers he reads than by his associates; for one's companions may be, for the time, thrust upon him, whereas his reading is the result of choice. Some people read a great many books that they do not own and others own many books they do not read. The person of decided literary tastes usually knows his library through, and also reads a great deal outside of his own book shelves. Books constantly before the eyes in the library at home are a perpetual invitation to seek information, and while the tides of fortune and sentiment may ebb and flow the immortal writings of Shakespeare, Milton, Byron, Dante, Irving, Hawthorne, Emerson, Bacon, Dickens, Coleridge, Tennyson, Longfellow, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Harriet Beecher Stowe and a host of others will remain the same substantial companions and friends.

Professor Traill, a well-known English scholar, suggests that the old romances or the tragedies of Shakespeare might be made excellent use of by writers of the realistic school, there being material enough in them to furnish plot and dialogue for a dozen modern novels. He points out, for example, the extraordinary waste of material of which that romantic prodigal, Shakespeare, was guilty in his treatment of the story of Othello. The speech of the Moor to the Venetian senate would, of itself, make up material for a volume of the realistic school. Observe the possibilities. "Her father loved me, oft invited me." At this juncture it might be explained why a haughty Venetian should have loved a Moor. Senator Brabantio was undoubtedly a candidate for re-election, and was using every means to conciliate the colored voters. The story of the campaign would be good for at least two chapters; and then there might appropriately follow a disquisition on modern politics and parties. Also, Othello, in telling how Desdemona listened to his "travelers' tales," says that "her house affairs would draw her thence, which ever as she could with haste dispatch, she'd come again." A modern novelist might make a great deal out of this first Desdemona, who evidently was her father's housekeeper, and who was called into the kitchen by the cook to inform the butcher whether roast beef or mutton was wanted for dinner. Next, she had to leave the parlor just as Othello was explaining who the Anthropophagi were and engage in an altercation with the washerwoman as to whether there were seventeen or eighteen pieces in the week's wash. Then the card of Signor Matallozzi was sent in, and Desdemona, after again excusing herself to Othello, went out, only to find that the Signor wanted to leave her a free sample of Blobbs' unrivaled stove polish, which could be found at all respectable grocers. The emotions which must have racked Desdemona during the happening of these incidents could be fully analyzed, and from the standpoint of realism some very complex and thrilling situations might be evolved.

Professional Chat.

A young lawyer in Springfield, Mo., took an appeal from a justice because the court was suffering from a severe attack of grippe when he rendered his decision.

Young doctor—"I performed my first surgical operation to-day; a man shot himself and I attended him." Old doctor—"Ah! did you save him?" Young doctor—"No, he died; I had to cut him all to pieces, but I got the bullet."

There's a young doctor up town who will have to improve his methods or he will never have patients enough to maintain him. A woman came in to see him only two days ago, looking haggard and pale. "Well," he said, "what is it?" "I'm troubled with insomnia," she sighed. "What shall I do for it?" "Sleep it off, madam; sleep it off," he advised curtly, and charged her $2.

A Correct Quotation.—A candidate was being examined by four professors. Feeling extremely nervous, his memory failed him several times. At last one of the professors, growing impatient, thundered out: "Why, you cannot quote a single passage of Scripture correctly!" "Yes, I can!" exclaimed the candidate. "I just happen to remember a passage in the Revelation, 'And I lifted up my eyes and beheld four great beasts!'"

Be still, my child! remain in statu quo,
While I propel thy cradle to and fro.
Let no involved res inter alios
Prevail while we're consulting inter nos.

Was that a little pain in media res?
Too bad! too bad! we'll have no more of these.
I'll send a capias for some wise expert
Who knows how to eject the pain and stay the hurt.

No trespasser shall come to trouble thee;
For thou dost own this house in simple fee—
And thy administrators, heirs, assigns,
To have, to hold, convey, at thy designs.

Correct thy pleadings, my own baby boy,
Let there be an abatement of thy joy;
Quash every tendency to keep awake,
And verdict, costs and judgment thou shalt take.

A Thief who had Broken into a House which was uncared for, was engaged in Packing up a great amount of Plunder when he was suddenly Interrupted and badly Frightened by a Person who Walked in at the back door. "If you are the Owner, then I Beg to remark that all I Want is a chance to go quietly out," observed the Thief, as the two confronted each other. "But I am Not." "If you are an Officer I shall Resist to the Last." "But I am Not." "If you are a Thief, like myself, I am willing to Divide," continued the Depredator. "But I am not a Thief," persisted the other. "Then who can you be?" "A Criminal Lawyer, sir!" "Oh—ah! that settles it! You take all the Plunder and I run all the Risks! I at once Abdicate in your Favor!"

Give Justice her apportioned place,
And rout the fierce and ravening Beast;
In gardens of the human race
She scorns no humblest flower the least.
In her wide realm no arm is bound,
Her share is equal, each with each;
She grants, for all may tread her ground,
The fool and Goethe equal speech.

Justice has never eye for creed,
Nor race, nor outward hue of skin;
Only the color of the deed,
Only the blackness of the sin.
And Justice asketh when he errs,
This brother, sister, mine and thine,
If the misdeeds of his or hers
Be not the fault of yours and mine.

Hers is the saving power that makes
Republics strong; their fabrics sure;
With it a mightier spirit wakes
That longer than the hills endure.
Oh, spirit, urging strong and far,
Teach thou Columbia's sons to see
The rising of a blessed star
Above the cradle of the free.

All Indians greatly dislike what they call the white man's smell, and can detect it with perfect ease. "I have," says a Western man, "entered tepees of the Utes filled with Indians who had not bathed for a year, and whose aroma rose to heaven, and every one of them would complain of the odor that I brought in with me. The same feeling is manifested by the Chinese, who themselves have a very marked odor that is intensely disagreeable to whites. As a matter of fact, each race has its peculiar odor, which is not perceptible by people of similar origin, but which is plainly noticeable by those of different blood."

To publish one's own books has been thought to be a very foolish and unremunerative plan—especially by publishers. It was supposed to be an exceedingly impractical thing for Mr. Ruskin to bring out editions of his works; yet it appears that his profits are growing every year, and that from one book alone—the new edition of his "Modern Painters"—the profit will not be less than $30,000.

NOTES.

The spike-tail pony, the long-horn cow and the razor back hog are the most intelligent of our dumb animals, as is proven by statistics. They never get killed on railroads.

A boot sole, the bottom covered with iron, was found imbedded in a chunk of coal at Benton Harbor the other day. This coal was made several years B. C., and the sole must have been an old iron one of capital, left in the footprint of the march of time.

This is the latest opinion promulgated by Colonel Ingersoll: "There will never be a really great civilization until women enjoy the same rights as do the men. The highest ambition of any man is to win the love of some noble girl, and the highest ambition of any good girl must be to win the love of some good man."

When a mad dog invaded a Detroit church last Sunday the sexton knocked him in the head with a chair and one of the worshipers dragged the carcass out and emptied into it "five chambers of his revolver." In a congregation like that you will never hear of the services being interrupted by disorderly people. They all go "heeled."

The cost of living was never before so cheap in this country as it is to-day, and this pleasant condition is largely due to the tariff reductions of a Republican Congress. It is hardly necessary to add that the Democratic papers have good reasons for keeping so quiet upon a subject that is particularly interesting to the American people.

The ignorance of American women concerning the politics of their own country has frequently been commented upon by foreigners. In England the women are thoroughly informed on all political questions. Political subjects are discussed there at the fireside and around the dinner table, and the women were able to hold their own in argument with the ablest statesmen. It is a part of their education from childhood.

It may seem strange, but it is nevertheless true, that alcohol regularly applied to the thrifty farmer's stomach will remove the boards from the fence, let the cattle into his crops, kill his fruit trees, mortgage his farm and sow his fields with wild oats and thistles. It will take the paint off his buildings, break the glass out of them and fill them with rags. It will take the gloss from his clothes and polish from his manner, subdue his reason, arouse his passions, bring sorrow and disgrace upon his family and topple him into a drunkard's grave.

Secretary Rusk, in speaking of the recent presidential trip, said that it was a wonderful one. Especially gratifying was the reception in the South, but the great American public was enthusiastic from start to finish, and if the good folks on the route omitted any courtesy it would be more than he could do to discover the gap. "The feature of the trip that impressed me more even than the popular enthusiasm," continued the Secretary, "was the remarkable oratorical ability of the President. He made a greater number of first-class speeches in a month than many public men could think out and deliver in a lifetime; and his efforts were not at all prearranged, for some of the best things he said were spontaneous."

The last census bulletin of date May 11th, is devoted to the distribution of population in accordance with latitude and longitude. Naturally the greater density of population in a square degree is governed by the location of the larger cities. Thus the two square degrees between latitudes 40° and 41° and longitudes 73° and 75°, comprising New York, Brooklyn, Jersey City, and other large cities, contain 3,653,000 inhabitants. The square degree between latitudes 42° and 43° and longitudes 71° and 72°, comprising Boston and its suburbs, has 1,233,000 inhabitants; that between latitudes 39° and 40° and longitudes 75° and 76°, in which is most of Philadelphia, has 1,414,000, while that between latitudes 41° and 42° and longitudes 87° and 88°, in which is situated most of Chicago, contains 950,000 people.

A family reunion of the heirs of President Millard Fillmore took place in Buffalo recently, says the Brooklyn Eagle. They met not only to pay their respects to the memory of the deceased, but to receive their share of the fortune of nearly half a million dollars, which he left to be divided among them. A telegram from Buffalo to the New York Times gives the following interesting incident of the meeting: "Those who passed in or out of the Tift House bar-room this afternoon could not have helped noticing a little party of four men. They would have attracted attention in any place, for they were typical farmers and all were happily drunk. To-night they are still more drunk and are drinking cocktails as fast as the drink dispenser can make them." Moralists may prate and protest as much as they please, but when men's heartstrings are stretched and twisted by the death of a dear relative they will drown their sorrow in the flowing bowl.

A new experiment, that of serving a dinner party with salad grown under the guests' own eyes, was successfully tried at the house of Prince and Princess Blucher the other day. Here is the recipe: Take a good germinating lettuce seed and soak it in alcohol for about six hours, sow it into an equal mixture of rich soil and unslacked lime and place it on the table. After the soup, water it with lukewarm water, whereupon it begins to sprout immediately. At the Prince's party the thing worked like a charm, and the lettuces when plucked and prepared for eating were of the size of Barcelona nuts.

Courts of conscience were courts for the recovery of small debts by summary process before commissioners were appointed for that purpose. In the ninth year of King Henry VIII the court of conscience or court of request in London was created, and an act of common council directed that the lord mayor and aldermen should assign monthly two aldermen and four discreet commoners to be commissioners, to sit in their court twice a week to hear and determine all matters brought before them between party and party, between citizens and freemen of London, in all cases where the debt or damage was under 40 shillings. This council was confirmed by Stat. I. Jac. 1, c. 14, which empowered the commissioners of this court to make such orders between the parties touching such debts as they should find stand to equity and good conscience. The jurisdiction of these courts was extended to debts of £5 in the city of London. The courts were superseded in 1847 by the county courts.

It is not such wretched taste, perhaps, as the long skirt, but it is ridiculous all the same, the black "beauty spot" on the veil. Why is it there? Simply to say to the earnest spectator on the street—look at me. I am placed here to draw your attention to my mistress's pretty mouth or shapely nose. I am not a bit of court-plaster, but I look like one, and answer the purpose. It is almost incredible that women whose modesty is beyond reproach can so plainly advertise their personal charms on the streets. When any article of a man's attire is designedly conspicuous he confesses to the weakness of vanity or the misfortune of bad breeding; and difficult and distasteful as it would be to apply the same rule to the sex, it is impossible to find a valid reason for not doing so. The restrictions are fewer for women, of course, in the selection of street dress, and in the matter of color and cut, indeed, her freedom of choice is limited only by the decrees of fashion and the dictates of good taste; but when fashion leaps the boundaries of common sense and decency, as she has a scurvy trick of doing often enough, the woman of character and modesty revolts. That is exactly why the miserable dotlet on the veil should be abolished.

Horace Chilton, who succeeds Senator Regan, is the first native Texan to occupy a seat in the Senate. This calls attention to the fact that a large percentage of Senators do not represent the States of their birth. Four members of the next Senate were born beyond the limits of the United States. McMillan, of Michigan, was born in Hamilton, Ont., and Gallinger, of New Hampshire, first saw the light at Cornwall, in the same province of Canada. Jones, of Nevada, is a native of Herefordshire, England, and Pasco, of Florida, was born in London. New York State leads all others as the birthplace of Senators in the common Congress. Here are the names of thirteen of them: Stanford and Felton, of California; Davis, of Minnesota; Saunders, of Montana; Paddock, of Nebraska; Stewart, of Nevada; McPherson, of New Jersey; Hill and Hiscock, of New York; Casey, of North Dakota; Dolph, of Oregon, and Squire, of Washington. McPherson and Casey were born at York, Livingston county, the former in 1833 and the latter in 1837. Ohio stands next to New York, with eight of her sons in the Senate. Pennsylvania and Kentucky have six each; Vermont, five; Tennessee, Georgia, Massachusetts, Maine and Virginia, each four; North Carolina and Delaware, three each; Illinois, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, South Carolina and West Virginia, two; and there will be one native of each of the following States: Arkansas, Alabama, Connecticut, Louisiana, Maryland, Missouri, Iowa and Indiana. New Jersey is the only Eastern State not represented.

An interesting object in the shape of an uncut copy of Thackeray's "Virginians" was sold in London the other day for $150. It had acquired a value exclusive of that of its printed contents—Thackeray had himself written this inscription on the fly-leaf:

In the U. States and in the Queen's dominions
All people have a right to their opinions,
And many don't much relish "The Virginians."
Peruse my book, dear R., and if you find it
A little to your taste, I hope you'll bind it.
Peter Rackham, Esqre., with the best regards of the Author.

"Dear R.," however, refrained from binding his author's presentation copy, much to the joy of the modern collector.

Weehawken and the New York Bay.

Weehawken! In thy mountain scenery yet,
All we adore of nature in her wild
And frolic hour of infancy is met;
And never has a summer's morning smiled
Upon a lovelier scene than the full eye
Of the enthusiast revels on—when high

Amid thy forest solitude, he climbs
O'er crags that proudly tower above the deep,
And knows that sense of danger which sublimizes
The breathless moment, when his daring step
Is on the verge of the cliff, and he can hear
The low dash of the wave, with startled ear,

Like the death music of his coming doom,
And clings to the green turf with desperate force,
As the heart clings to life; and when resume
The currents in his veins their wonted course,
There lingers a deep feeling—like the moan
Of wearied ocean when the storm is gone.

In such an hour he turns, and on his view
Ocean and earth and heaven burst before him;
Clouds slumbering at his feet, and the clear blue
Of summer's sky in beauty bending o'er him—
The city bright below; and far away,
Sparkling in golden light, his own romantic bay.

Tall spire, and glittering roof, and battlement,
And banners floating in the sunny air;
And white sails o'er the calm blue waters bent,
Green isle, and circling shore, are blended there
In wild reality. When life is old,
And many a scene forgot, the heart will hold

Its memory of this; nor lives there one
Whose infant breath was drawn, or boyhood's days
Of happiness were passed beneath that sun,
That in his manhood's prime can calmly gaze
Upon that bay, or on that mountain stand,
Nor feel the prouder of his native land.

—Fitz-Greene Halleck.

Wandering Bottles on the Sea.

Of all the wonders that those who go down to the sea in ships are brought in contact with, none is so unfathomable or incomprehensible as those mighty rivers that flow through the ocean, and are known as streams where they are well defined, and as currents where they are not. The United States Hydrographic Office has been making, in the last few years, a series of experiments calculated to test fully the theory of streams and currents in the North Atlantic. Lieutenant Nazaro has among his treasures in the branch hydrographic office in this city a little bottle which once held a half-pint of whisky. Subsequent to that it held a paper saying that it was dropped overboard from the steamship Cephalonia, 400 miles east of Boston. It was brought into this port two years after it was dropped overboard by a schooner from Ambergris Key, a little island in the Bahama group.

This bottle, with its paper inside, had proved the theory of ocean currents. It had followed the Gulf Stream until it had been caught by that current which sweeps to the south along the coasts of Eastern Europe and Northern Africa, had been carried thence to the westward until it entered the Caribbean Sea, then passed between the western end of Cuba and Cape Gracias a Dios, the eastern extremity of Yucatan, and, having made the circuit of the Gulf of Mexico, was washed ashore on the western end of Ambergris Key.

Other bottles which have been dropped overboard by outgoing steamers, have, as a rule, been as satisfactory in the result of their drift as the bottle from the Cephalonia, but some of them have developed marked eccentricities in their voyages. Thus, one which was thrown overboard from the steamship Aller, off Cape Race, the southeastern extremity of Newfoundland, seems to have made a "bee line" for the Azores, where it was picked up on the beach near Fayal. In its voyage it went directly across the Gulf Stream, and followed a current never before suspected. A bottle dropped overboard by the steamship Sardinian, about 300 miles southeast of Cape Farewell, the southern extremity of Greenland, was picked up on the shores of Norway, and one dropped overboard about 200 miles off the coast of Scotland, was found in nearly the same place. Both of these bottles, journeying toward the land of the midnight sun, had shown a strong current setting from the North Atlantic on the Norwegian shores.

The general result, so far, seems to be that a strong current sets from the east upon the shores of the British Isles, and a strong one rushes into the Caribbean Sea from the Atlantic. This is a fact long maintained by writers on physical geography, but never before demonstrated as it has been by the Hydrographic Office. But the experiments of the Hydrographic Office have also developed the fact that various other subsidiary currents, acting over a large space, exist which were not before suspected.—N. Y. Tribune.

A work of art entitled "Bust of a Young Man with His Mouth Open" has been stolen from the Dresden museum, and the thief is supposed to have gone to the United States. Young men with their mouths open, however, are already a great nuisance in the United States in most of the walks of life, and the thief will find a poor market for his booty. A young man with his mouth shut and on a "bust" at the same time would meet with a reception hilarious in its enthusiasm.

Wrangling Trustees.

It is with sincere regret we find the personal differences of members of the City Board of Trustees again obtruded upon the public, and through the medium of undignified statements in interviews with newspaper reporters. The people presumptively elected the members of the Board to intelligently administer the business affairs of the municipality; we see no excuse that advantage should be taken of important official stations to unfavorably advertise this people to the world. That our citizens have made unpardonable blunders in the selection of some of their officers has been long apparent; for the good people we have no sympathy, as it was their own act, and they alone have suffered. That our Board seems incapable of transacting public business until after indulging in a ridiculous "monkey and parrot time"—and even then not transacting it—may afford the amusement comedy is calculated to produce, but we imagine the outside world wonders what manner of people we are. We are, however, disposed to view this matter philosophically. Other cities and other countries have in a measure suffered likewise. We have no other authority than that of Cervantes concerning the government of the island of Baratalia under the administration of Sancho Panza, who, it seems, started his political career as the squire of one Don Quixote de la Mancha, a noble knight-errant, possessed of sufficient influence to bring Sancho to the front. From the account of Cervantes, Sancho was not fitted to fill the office, but he had sense enough to keep his mouth shut, yet even what little he did say was not approved by Don Quixote, for the record shows that the latter, in a communication to the Governor, wrote: "In the next place, Sancho, do not intermix in thy discourse such a multitude of proverbs as thou wert wont to do; for, though proverbs are concise and pithy sentences, thou dost often so drag them in by the head and shoulders that they seem rather the maxims of folly than of wisdom."

Whatever may be said of Governor Panza, it must be conceded to him that he realized his entire incompetence to administer the governmental affairs of his island, for we find him remarking to his political potentates: "Do but call to mind what first put this whim of government into my noddle, you will find it in your own self; for, as for me, I know no more what belongs to islands and governors than a blind buzzard. So if you fancy the devil will have me for being a governor, let me be plain Sancho still, and go to heaven, rather than My Lord Governor, and go to hell." On a close reading of Cervantes, we must conclude that distinguished author esteemed Sancho as one not fitted to administer his trust; our estimate of the governor is, however, different, for throughout the entire narrative of Don Quixote there is a thread showing that Sancho realized he had undertaken a responsibility beyond his capabilities, and that he desired to get out of it. Fortunately for him no newspapers were published in that day, yet had there been, we doubt if he would have availed himself of that avenue to advertise his lack of administrative capacity. Cervantes wrote in an age when criticism of official incapacity was more severe than now. As he is dead, and cannot reply, it would be unjust for us to extensively criticize the estimate he placed on Governor Panza. Cervantes died before the city of Sacramento was founded.

Up the River.

Under the auspices of Sacramento Council No. 27, Y. M. I., a moonlight excursion party of about 900 went up the river Wednesday evening as far as the mouth of the Feather, on the steamer Gov. Dana and the barge Onisbo. The arrangements for the excursion were perfect, and there was no mishap. Throughout it was pleasurable.

The Young Folks.

On Wednesday evening the young folks gave an enjoyable entertainment at the residence of E. C. Parsons, at Seventeenth and G Streets. There were presented "The Lovers' Stratagem"—Squire Hinsdale, rich old bachelor, George W. Larkin; Rowland Hinsdale, the Squire's nephew, Oscar Beatty; Nathalie Gwynne, a cottage girl, engaged to Rowland Hinsdale, Miss Margaret Parsons; Mother Gwynne, Ella Howe; Stella Murdock, a poetess, Miss Alice Willis; Madge, a waiting maid to Stella Murdock, Miss Ethel Keefer. "Who Wins?"—Miss Serana Smart, the old maid, Miss Margaret Parsons; Miss Margaret Bright, another old maid, Miss Eugenie Hughes; Mr. Forlorn Fidgetts, a young man, George W. Larkin; Hetty, the maid, Miss Alice Willis. The evening was pleasantly spent, and it must be said the participants, especially Oscar Beatty and George W. Larkin, acted well their parts. At the conclusion of the entertainment refreshments were served.

Organize.

This would be a good time for the patriotic Republicans to get together and take measures for a permanent organization in the shape of a club or league similar to that now so prominent in San Francisco—the Union League Club. The fact that there might be a possibility of securing the National Convention in 1892 is an incentive for active organization and work. An organization of the Republicans who have the interest of the party and the country at heart is of vital importance. We think there should be something done at once in this direction. Let a number of the thoughtful men meet and formulate a plan, after which the rank and file could put the work into execution and effect or perfect as well as a permanent organization. We rather favor the Union League Club idea. Such an organization in this city would become central so far as the northern and central part of the State is concerned.

Conventional People.

There was a young woman who said with earnestness and sincerity: "I would rather sit in a stupid parlor a whole stupid evening with the stupidest people living; I would rather feel the rain of dullness splashing down over my face and into my eyes, and know it was all right and proper, than be introduced to the brightest people on this earth if there was about them the least trace of unconventionality." And there was a woman who heard this dictum and who went from the hearing of it straightway to eat a dinner given to the only college President in the whole United States, probably, who would sit down in a flannel shirt to a board surrounded in his honor by a hundred of his old students, half in swallow-tailed coats and the other half in rose-decked gowns. And when the woman looked at the fine, simple, scholarly face and then at the gray flannel, she said to herself: "This man would not be the man he is if any self-consciousness had made him so much as question with himself the propriety of wearing or laying aside his unconventional clothes." And so this woman further said to herself: "In this world there are many opinions."—New York Recorder.

A Trick With Coppers.

Here is a very simple little trick with pennies that will catch the sharpest of your friends, and is divulged by the New York Herald. Place six pennies on the table and arrange them in the form of a Roman cross—that is, four pennies in a perpendicular row for the upright, and one on each side of the second penny for the cross piece. You will then have two rows, the up and the down row with four pennies and the horizontal row with three in it. Ask your friends to place them in two rows with four in a row by only changing the position of one penny. They will try, but they won't succeed.

Then crush them and win the drinks, if you happen to be of that nature, by placing the lower penny of the perpendicular row on the center penny. Of course, you did not stipulate that the coins were not to be placed on top of one another, and you have done the trick fairly. But it always leads to a dispute.

Boiled Chicken, Southern Style—Truss and stuff the chicken as for roasting, dredge it all over with white flour and put it in a pot of boiling water. Take the pot off the fire for five minutes after the chicken is put in or the skin will crack. Then let it boil very gently, according to age and weight, an old fowl requiring twice as long to boil as a young one. Allow fifteen minutes to the pound. Take off the scum as it rises, and when done serve with egg sauce or parsley or oyster sauce and mashed potatoes. This is a nice way to cook an old chicken, as it is much more tender and nourishing than baked, for if the chicken is old baking toughens it. We have given the recipe for egg sauce before. It should be made rich with cream and butter.

The White House.

The President's home is like all the other mansions in America, from the humblest to the greatest; within its portals the drama of life has been enacted as in the millions of other homes all over the country. It had been built nearly a century, however, before a President brought a bride there. John Tyler, the fifteenth President, was the first who took a bride to the White House. He had been married in 1813 to Miss Semple, and she came to the presidential mansion with him when he succeeded President Harrison, in April, 1841, but she died a little later, and in 1844 the President married Miss Gardier at her home on Staten Island and took her immediately to the White House. President Cleveland was the only President who married his wife at the White House. That was June 2, 1886, when Miss Frances Folsom became the "first lady in the land."

Mrs. Washington never entered the White House as its mistress. Mrs. John Adams came first in the line of the eminent women who breathed the Potomac malaria within its precincts. Mr. Jefferson, General Jackson, Mr. Van Buren and Mr. Arthur were widowers. Mr. Buchanan was an old bachelor and Mr. Cleveland was a young bachelor when they were inaugurated. Mr. Jefferson's daughter did the honors for him. Mrs. A. J. Donelson and Mrs. Andrew Jackson, the younger, were the leading women of "Old Hickory's" household. Mr. Van Buren's daughters and daughters-in-law made the historic residence gay in his time, and Miss Harriet Lane, who did the honors for her uncle, Mr. Buchanan, is still remembered by hosts of friends whom she entertained. Mr. Arthur's social administration was presided over by his sister, Mrs. McElroy. Miss Elizabeth Cleveland represented Mr. Cleveland until his marriage. The wives of all the other Presidents have enjoyed the triumphs and troubles which attend this exalted station, the struggles for precedence and the jealousies of women whose husbands were rivals politically, for although the President's wife is always the "first lady of the land," without any quibbling, nobody has yet been able to decide positively who is the "second lady." It is said that General Jackson's wife died of excitement incident to his election to the presidency. On the other hand, Mrs. Millard Fillmore, having spent nearly three years in the White House, died a few days after she left it.

The first funeral that ever came out of the executive residence was that of President William Henry Harrison, who served the country one month. Since that time the White House has been the scene of the funerals of Secretary of State Upshur and Secretary of the Navy Gilmer, both killed by the explosion of a great gun on the Princeton in 1844. President Zachary Taylor was also buried from the White House and President Lincoln's funeral came out of the same portals. From its walls President Garfield was brought forth to die at Elberon by the seaside, and the last sad ceremony at the great mansion a little over a year ago is still fresh in the memory of the whole country.

Cucumber as Food.

Many people are under the impression that cucumber is very indigestible, and when they eat it they do so under protest and with apprehensions of possibly dire consequences. How this delusion can have arisen it is difficult to say, unless it be that cucumber is often eaten with salmon and other indigestible, table friends. It is not the cucumber, however, but the salmon that sits so heavy upon our stomach's throne. Cucumber, in fact, is very digestible when eaten properly. It cannot, indeed, be otherwise when it is remembered that it consists mainly of water and that those parts which are not water are almost exclusively cells of a very rapid growth. In eating cucumber it is well to cut it into thin slices and to masticate them thoroughly. Even the vinegar and the pepper that are so often added to it are of service to digestion if not taken in excess. The cucumber, as everyone knows, belongs to the melon tribe; but in our somewhat cold country it does not grow to any very large size, and therefore, it is firmer and looks less digestible than its congener, the melon.—London Hospital.

The Saxe Holm stories were attributed to a woman, not a man, and she an American. She was Helen Maria Fiske Jackson. She was born at Amherst, Mass., October 18, 1831, and died in San Francisco, August 12, 1885. She was the daughter of Professor Nathan W. Fiske, of Amherst, and was educated at the Ipswich, Mass., female seminary. In October, 1852, she married Capt. Edward B. Hunt. She had become known as a contributor to periodical literature under the signature of "H. H.," when in October, 1875, she married William S. Jackson, and thereafter spent much of her time in Colorado Springs, where her husband was a banker. She became deeply interested in the cause of the Indian, and on her death-bed wrote to the President an appeal asking for the "righting of the wrongs of the Indian race."

Baron Rothschild's Maxims.

The elder Baron Rothschild had the walls of his bank placarded with the following curious maxims:

Carefully examine every detail of your business.

Be prompt in everything.

Take time to consider and then decide quickly.

Dare to go forward.

Bear trouble patiently.

Be brave in the struggle of life.

Maintain your integrity as a sacred thing.

Never tell business lies.

Make no useless acquaintances.

Never to appear something more than you are.

Pay your debts promptly.

Learn how to risk your money at the right moment.

Shun strong liquor.

Employ your time well.

Do not reckon upon chance.

Be polite to everybody.

Never be discouraged.

Then work hard and you will be certain to succeed.

Resources of the American Republic.

Public documents may be useful without being generally interesting, and although the governmental presses issue them with praiseworthy regularity, including some patience, it is only occasionally that a book is sent out from Washington which is calculated to commend itself so much as the Hand Book of the American Republics. It is bulletin No. 1 of the issue of the Bureau of the American Republics. The frontispiece is Watling's Island, the first land seen by Columbus. An international American conference met in Washington from October 2, 1889, to April 19, 1890, where all the independent nations of North, Central and South America and the republic of Hayti were represented. This conference recommended the establishment of an association, under the title of "The International Union of American Republics for the Prompt Collection and Distribution of Commercial Information," which was to be represented at Washington, under the supervision of the Secretary of State, by a bureau of the American republics. This bulletin is the first contribution of the kind. Here we have important historical data to become more valuable with age. The "Historical Notes About America" opens the door to a series of glimpses into the past, which are so arranged as to be useful for reference.

The discovery of America by Northmen introduces the reader to a chapter of events which have, first of all, the quality of antiquity. It occurs that in 985 Bjarni, son of Herjulf, an Icelandic, hearing that his father had gone to Greenland, determined to go there and join him. He was driven out of his course and saw an unknown country which, it appears, was the New England shore. Fifteen years later, in 1,000, Lief, son of Eric, undertook an expedition and landed in Helluland, now Newfoundland. Next they made a landing at Markland (Woodland), now Nova Scotia. Their next landing was on an island now known as Nantucket. Another sail brought them to Mount Hope bay and Fall river, where they anchored for the winter. "The country was named Vinland from the abundance of grapes found in the vicinity. The Northmen called the country somewhere south of Vinland the White Man's land, or Great Ireland, and believed that it was occupied by Irish." The following passage contains the names and nativity of early voyagers:

Some were not natives of the country of their service. Christopher Columbus was a native of Cogerio, near Genoa, Italy, born about 1435; he set out on a voyage of discovery in the service of Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain, August 3, 1492. John Cabot's birthplace is a matter of doubt. If not by birth a citizen of Venice he was by adoption, denization having been granted him in Venice, March 28, 1476, after a residence of fifteen years. He sailed in the service of England, May, 1497. Amerigo Vespucci, born in Florence, Italy, March 9, 1451, sailed in the service of Spain, May 20, 1499; in the service of Portugal, from May 10, 1501, and returned to the service of Spain in 1506. Fernando Magellan, born at Alemejo, Portugal, 1470; in the service of Spain he commanded an expedition which sailed September 20, 1519, which completed the circumnavigation of globe September 8, 1522. Jean Verazzani, a native of Florence, Italy, entered the service of France January 7, 1524. Cabrillo, a native of Portugal, in the Spanish service, explored the coast of California. Henry Hudson, a native of England, entered the service of the Dutch East India Company in 1609 and discovered the site of New York. Vitus Behring, a Dane by birth, entered into the service of Russia in 1728.

Among the useful facts concerning America are some which the reader may find interesting and useful for remembrance. Here are a few of them:

The banana is the most productive of the fruits of the earth, being 44 times more productive than the potato and 131 more productive than wheat.

The highest inhabited altitude is the Buddhist Cloister, Halue, in Thibet—16,000 feet; the next highest is Galera, a railway station in Peru—15,635 feet.

There are about 4,000,000 llamas used in Peru as beasts of burden.

The highest tide in the world is in the Bay of Bengal, 70 feet; the lowest is at Panama, 23 inches.

Midway between the islands of Tristan d'Acunha and the mouth of the Rio de la Plata the bottom was reached at the depth of 7,706 fathoms, equal to 46,236 feet, or 8 1/4 miles; at a point 300 miles from the Bermudas, 5,700 fathoms of line were paid out (nearly 6 1/2 miles) and no bottom found.

Women Like Flowers.

Ellis Wheeler Wilcox, in the Ladies' Home Journal, claims that there are as many kinds of women as there are flowers and vegetables. That every woman can be analyzed into some department of her mental conservatory. We give her analysis of the "kissable" woman, as taken from her June bouquet:

Her size, age, tints, features, disposition, character—one and all have seemingly nothing to do with her charm. All you are conscious of in her presence is the desire to take her in your arms and kiss her. She may be absolutely devoid of personal beauty, and not young, and yet nine men and a half and seven women out of each ten, will want to kiss her if they are in her presence five minutes. Sometimes she is good and kind and unselfish, and possessed of beauty; and then she is always breaking hearts without meaning to do so, and winning love she cannot return, and incurring criticism she does not deserve. She sees more beautiful women giving more encouragement to men than she gives, and indulging in far more desperate flirtations without causing any such disaster as she causes by one kind, sweet smile; and she cannot understand it all, at least not until she has had all sorts of trouble out of it. But the fact is, that the men who are quite hardened to flirtations with the merely beautiful women, lose their heads in an insane desire to seize the kissable girl in their arms. Women who do not possess this charm, and who play a bold game of flirtation without incurring any such risks and dangers, find it impossible to explain the effect of the kissable girl upon her admirers. They think she must be a very deep and adroit siren at heart, while, in fact, she is often frankness personified. She is inclined to become somewhat selfish, however, as time passes, in her love of admiration, and to take as her natural right more love than belongs to her. But she is never malicious or intentionally unkind. She feels sorry for her lovers after she has won them, and she never wounds another woman if she can help it without a too great sacrifice of the love and devotion which is her native element. She is full of love herself, and her friendships are inclined to be as ardent as the love of the "handsome" woman. Her rejected lovers become her friends almost always, and her husband worships her and finds her a better wife than she was a sweetheart. If she marries a man strong and tactful enough to keep her entire heart, she becomes a great favorite with her own sex, for women have always been inclined to adore her when they were not jealous of her influence over men.

I place the kissable woman among my luscious roses—with now and then a hidden thorn—my spicy carnations, wherein a bee may be concealed, and my fragrant magnolias. Discussing another whom she calls the "designing" woman, with the fair face and voluptuous form, who is politic in all she says or does: She always has her little axe to grind, hidden somewhere in the folds of her costly robe—for she always wears costly dresses and worships jewels. She seeks the love of men who can advance her interests and increase her revenue, and she considers nothing immoral that is not found out. She studies the weaknesses of the sterner sex and is willing to take any risk with an expectation of financial or social benefit. She assumes great virtue, frequents churches, is liberal in public charities, often courts the women who can give her a back-ground of respectability; ignores snubs, and smiles down cold stares. She invites herself to houses where she thinks it is well for her to be seen, and if the society paper chronicles her name as one of the guests she feels repaid for any neglect or indifference she may have received while there. She cares only for men as they may be useful to her, but she is such an adept in the arts of fascination that she is capable of increasing their very intense—if very fleeting—devotion, and they are not infrequently ready to sacrifice name and honor for her. But she disillusions them with her mercenary frivolities, and her husband finds her disloyal, and her career is certain to end in that of an adventuress. She is sure to attract a vast amount of comment and notice wherever she goes, and she is quite content if she can make a sensation. She belongs with the uncanny cactus plants, and the gorgeous-hued tropical flowers from which deadly poisons are distilled.

NEW ROUTE TO BARTLETT SPRINGS.

Its Many and Varied Attractions.

The Southern Pacific Company, in connection with William Spiers and L. E. McMahan & Sons, have put in operation a new route to Bartlett Springs that gives the visitor to that famous resort the most delightful trip that can be made in the State, for it is a combination of short rail, steamer and stage rides, which bring into view the most charming scenery of Central California. None of the various divisions of the route are long enough to weary the traveler, and all have distinct charms of their own.

Passengers from San Francisco leave by the ferry at 7:30 A. M., cross the bay to Oakland Pier, run up the bay by rail to Vallejo Junction, cross the straits to Vallejo, pass up the Napa valley by rail to Calistoga, arriving at 10:45 A. M.; take Spiers' stage over Mt. St. Helena to Lower Lake Landing, arriving at 4:00 P. M.; take the steamer on Clear Lake for a run of twenty-one miles, arriving at Bartlett Springs Landing at 5:30 P. M.; take stage to Bartlett Springs, arriving at 8:30 P. M.

Passengers from Knights Landing, Marysville and Woodland will leave by train No. 50, connecting at Davis with the train which leaves Sacramento at 6:15 A. M., arriving at Suisun at 7:40 A. M., and connecting there with local train at 7:45 A. M., and at Napa Junction at 9:30 A. M. for the Calistoga train.

This new route is so full of interest, and is so great a novelty, that a short description of its less familiar features is timely. Merely for the sights to be seen on the way, without reference to the attractions of Bartlett Springs as a health resort, the trip has unequalled charms for pleasure seekers and tourists, while for invalids seeking benefit at the springs it is singularly pleasant and exhilarating, and is altogether a delightful novelty.

Not everybody has seen the Napa valley, and yet every mile of it is a picture. Compared with the Santa Clara valley it is narrow, and yet it is wide enough to contain some of the prettiest towns and most famous vineyards in California. In the other wine districts of the State an occasional vineyard may be seen from the train, but the wineries are remote. In the Napa valley the railroad forms a lane through miles of beautiful vineyards, while every one of the great stone wineries of the valley is close to the road. There are fine orchards, too; and it is a pleasant sight to see the highly cultivated orchards and vineyards covering the valley and sweeping over the hills, with handsome homes at short intervals all the way from Napa City to Calistoga. In one single stretch of nine miles the train stops at six pretty stations.

The valley closes in at Calistoga, and to the right towers the gray summit of Mt. St. Helena, 4,500 feet high. Mr. Spiers' fine new Concord stage, drawn by six spirited horses, takes the passengers at Calistoga and dashes away toward the gray old dead volcano. As the road rapidly ascends the mountain the upper end of Napa valley, with Calistoga in the center, unfolds like a panorama, and the scene is charming. Some bold features of the mountains bear witness to the volcanic history of the region.

High rocks, a lofty palisade of perpendicular stone, crowns the summit of the ride to the right, and upon a tall battlement crouches the "petrified bear," a singular stone formation of great size, outlined against the sky. In a few minutes an elevation of 3,000 feet is reached, and Napa valley from this great height looks like the work of a fairy's brush, so soft and minute are the details, and so exquisite the coloring. This is the highest point attained by the stage.

Fresh horses are taken at the Toll House, and then Lake county, that remarkable storehouse of natural wonders and beauties, is entered, and the stage skims along the splendid road as it drops down the canyon in the northern flank of Mt. St. Helena.

Rich and varied verdure in nature's order here, and handsome wild flowers in great abundance and variety, give broad splashes of red and yellow and blue and white to the prevalent shades of green. Bewitching glens and glades and canyons swing into view, and then give way to others just as handsome, and there is always in sight some mountain stream, each seeming cooler and shadier and more winsome than the last one passed. The horses are safe, the driver is alert and skillful, the road smooth and fine, and the big coach swings along as easily as a yacht before the wind.

Middletown is reached at 1.00 P. M. for luncheon, which Hank Moore serves with his old skill. The Langtry-Gebhardt stock farm is near, but not in sight. Fresh horses are taken at Middletown; oak-covered Coyote valley and the broad Putah creek are crossed. At Greene's ranch fresh horses again are taken, and the run is made down through the pretty town of Lower Lake, and then on across Cache creek, the outlet for Clear Lake, to Lower Lake Landing, where L. E. McMahan & Sons, proprietors of Bartlett Springs and of the steamer and stage lines from Lower Lake Landing, take charge of the passengers.

They board the City of Lakeport, the largest, prettiest, swiftest and most comfortable steamer on Clear Lake, and have a charming cruise of twenty-one miles on the lake. The steamer is commanded by Capt. Cal. C. McMahan, one of the owners, and the graceful little craft clips along at a rate of fourteen miles an hour.

Lower Lake is the southern extension of Clear Lake. It is separated from East Lake by a long peninsula that splits the lower end of Clear Lake into two parts. On emerging from Lower Lake the whole of East Lake comes into view, with the Indian rancheria and the great smelting works of Sulphur Bank Quicksilver Mine.

Soon the lake closes in, by reason of the intrusion of Mt. Kanocti on the western shore. This noble mountain is the monarch of all that region, as Mt. St. Helena is of upper Napa valley. It is 4,700 feet high. The elevation of Clear Lake is 1,200 feet.

It is in this trip only that all the beauties of Clear Lake are brought into review. Those who have never seen this charming sheet of water have a rich treat in store. It lies peacefully in a vast mountain-rimmed cup; and the shore, whether a steep slope or a cosy little valley and sand beach, is every mile of it a most charming picture. In time it will be lined with the villas of wealthy people, Buckingham Park and the late Capt. Floyd's country seat being pioneer manifestations of this inevitable happening.

The boat rapidly skims along under the afternoon shadow of towering double-peaked Kanocti (known better as "Uncle Sam Mountain" to Clear Lake dwellers lacking in fastidiousness); passes through the Narrows and enters the main body of the lake, which is eight miles wide.

Soda Bay lies under the northern wing of Kanocti, and here and there are fine baths and a hotel. Lakeport lies a row of white points on the distant western shore, and the steamer heads straight for Bartlett Springs Landing, arriving at 5:30 P. M.

McMahans' fine stage, drawn by brisk horses, driven by Ed. Walker, now takes the passengers over the splendid new turnpike to Bartlett Springs. For several miles the road ascends the mountains by many devious turns, and Clear Lake is in sight nearly till the summit, 3,500 feet high, is reached.

This view of the lake is of startling beauty; it is the noblest and handsomest bit of scenery between Lake Tahoe and the ocean. The reddening sun, sinking in the west, sends long shafts of red and golden light down to the surface of the deep blue water, and tips the limpid waves with gold. Sheeny stretches of light appear and disappear, and the softest colors float upon the lake. It is a scene to be treasured as long as memory obeys the law of its creation.

The lake and all its glories suddenly disappear, and the horses trot gayly down the grade toward the Springs. Handsome yellow pines and firs, alternating with massive oaks and wild flowers of many kinds, modestly claim attention. Pretty canyons and valleys are passed, and finally the big hotel of Bartlett Springs, nestled among its hundred cottages, welcomes the travelers.

Here guests, in number from eight hundred to a thousand, find many ways of amusing themselves. The owners of the property, enterprising and intelligent men, have been specially fortunate in securing H. S. Greeley as manager. The changes and improvements made by this well-known hotel manager are as radical as they are gratifying, and it is to be hoped that he can be retained permanently.

On this route to Bartlett's the traveler is taken past all the well-known mineral springs of Napa county. At Calistoga stages for the Geysers and the petrified forest connect with the train, and the route in Lake county passes close to such well-known health resorts as Ziegler's Springs, Howard Springs, Adams' Springs, Harbin's Springs and others.

This meager description of the finest trip in this part of the State cannot do justice to the charms and beauties which await the traveler. It will at once become the principal route to Bartlett's.

Many consider the idea that a man can feel pain in an amputated limb as a superstitious absurdity, but this opinion is a mistake. All the sensations that an injury to a foot would occasion, for instance, may be felt by one whose foot is amputated. There is a good physiological reason for this in the fact that many of the nerves that furnish communication between the brain are not injured in their activity by the amputation of their lower portion, and convey sensation as readily as ever. The brain fails to recognize the fact that the function of the nerve has changed, and that the part in which it formerly terminated exists no longer. Therefore, when a sensation is felt conveyed by a nerve that in the unamputated body led to the foot, the feeling is the same as if the foot was still in place. If certain nerves in an amputated leg be touched, the feeling is exactly the same as if the foot was touched, and the sensation of pain is felt not where it is applied, but where the mind has been in the habit of receiving communications from the nerve in question.

Horace Greeley once remarked of America: "We need a damned good licking," and when an Englishman indorsed the statement the old editor retorted: "But there is no nation in the world can lick us."

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY OF Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of J. C. Bainbridge, an insolvent debtor. J. C. Bainbridge having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said J. C. Bainbridge is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the county of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal of the said debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the county of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court room of said Court, on the 19th day of June, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M., of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the county of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. Dated, May 11th, 1891.

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to Helen A. Grant, Allen D. Grant, Edward N. Grant, Catherine Matzen, Mary M. Miller, John Doe, and Richard Roe, greeting.

You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the county of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 29th day of January, 1891, in which action EDWARD DIETERLE is plaintiff and you are defendants.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: The said action is brought for the purpose of quieting the title to that certain piece or parcel of land situated, lying and being in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, and State of California, and described according to the plan of said city, as the south twenty (20) feet of the west sixty-eight (68) feet of lot number one, in the block bounded by J and K, and 5th and 6th streets; for the purpose, also, of determining all adverse claims of the said defendants to said property; and for a decree of said Court, declaring and adjudging that the title of plaintiff to said premises is good and valid, and that neither the said defendants have, nor any of them has, any estate or interest in the same; and forever enjoining and debarring the said defendants, and each of them, from asserting any claim to said land adverse to plaintiff, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made.

And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL] and affix the seal of said Court this 20th day of February, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.

Origin of the Word Kaiser.
"Kaiser" is the German synonym of Caesar. By recourse to Brewer we obtain an interesting definition of the title. He says, by way of preliminary: "The Roman empire in its decline was divided into east and west. The popes of Rome ignored the east and assumed that the title of the old Roman emperor belonged exclusively to the west." Then in Selden's "Titles of Honor" we find that Charlemagne restored Leo III to the papal chair and, out of gratitude, Leo gave to Charlemagne the empty title of "Carolus Caesar Augustus," or "Karl Kaiser Augustus of the Romans." Keyser is low German for Caesar, and the title given by Leo becomes, in low German, "Karl Keyser Wahzen desz Reichs." The title was continued in the German successors of Charlemagne till the death of Charles le Gros, when it fell into abeyance for seventy-four years. In 962 Pope John XII restored the title, with a slight alteration, and crowned Otto I (the great king of Germany), "Kaiser of the Holy Roman Empire," and till 1056 his successors went to Rome, after their coronations as kings of Germany, to receive the additional title of "Kaiser" (of the Holy Roman Empire, or of the West). Heinrich III, just before his death, invented a new title, "King of the Romans," to be borne by the kings elect of Germany, and then the reigning king was kaiser or "Emperor of the Romans," and the king elect was "King of the Romans." In 1338 the electors decreed that it was not needful for a king of Germany to undergo a second coronation at Rome; but, inasmuch, as from the moment of his election he was "King of the Romans," he became ex officio "Emperor of the Romans," or Kaiser the moment he was crowned. From that time till 1508 the king regnant was ex officio "Emperor of the Romans," and the crown prince or king elect was "King of the Romans." In 1508 Maximilian intended to go to Rome to get crowned, but was prevented, and he assumed a somewhat new departure. Being king, he called himself "Emperor elect of the Romans," and henceforth the crown prince was "King of the Romans," but after the death of his father he became "Emperor elect of the Romans," and as soon as he was crowned he became King of Germany and Emperor of Rome. In 1806, Napoleon having mutilated the German empire, Francis II was obliged to abandon the title of "Emperor of the West" and assumed instead the title of "Emperor of Austria and King of Hungary," and the dominion is now styled the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

A Modern Methuselah.
The oldest man in the world is a citizen of Bogota, in Salvador. This Methuselah declares that he is 180 years old, and it would seem he flatters himself, for his neighbors give the assurance that he is older than he says he is, says an English literary paper. He is a half-breed named Michael Solis, whose existence was revealed to Dr. Louis Hernandez by one of the oldest planters in that locality, who as a child knew Solis as a centenarian. They have found in the year 1712 his signature among those person who contributed to the building of a Franciscan convent which exists near San Sebastian. His skin is like parchment, his long hair, of the whiteness of snow, envelopes his head like a turban, and his look is so keen that it made a disagreeable impression on the doctor. "I never eat but once a day," said he, "but I never use any but the strongest and most nourishing foods. My meals last a half hour, for I believe it is impossible to eat more in that time than the body can digest in 24 hours. I fast the first and fifteenth days of each month, and on those days I drink as much water as I can bear. I always let my food become cold before I touch it. It is to these things that I attribute my great age."

The Mean Girl
Unearths unpleasant secrets.
Shifts her burdens on the shoulders of others.
Says she will and conveniently forgets to keep her word.
Sings loudly when the rest of the choir are singing low.
Chooses for her opponent some one weaker than herself.
Is content to spend the time and money of those who cannot afford to lose it.
Never forgets to remind her friends of the favors she has bestowed.
Keeps the bitter memories of others in a healthy state of existence by her continued effort.
Buys a hat like her dearest foe's best one, and gives it away to the servant a fortnight later.
Lets her jealous nature and stinging tongue play false to those who have befriended her.
Contrasts the happiness or goodness of the third person singular with the lot of the person addressed.
Has no real friends, and, after all, deserves our pity because of the weakness of her character.

An old churchgoer remarked the other day: "There are some people who go to church and clasp their hands so tight in prayer that they can't get them apart when the contribution box comes around."

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

We shall ever have a deep and tender interest in the resting place of our heroic dead. Not only those great and brilliant captains—the renowned of the world—but those who have no place in history by name; the private soldier who fell in battle, occupies a place in our memory. The Memorial Day services are one of the means of keeping the memory of our private soldier as well as the gifted captains who have passed away. Our people decorate and guard their graves with sacredness. No wanton foot ever treads rudely the grave of the dead patriot; it is hallowed ground. This beautiful custom of Memorial Day service prevents the ravages of time or neglect, and perpetuates the glory of our nation's heroes for future generations. To-day we call back the faces and forms of our gallant leaders, as well as the ranks. The fields that were wet with their blood are before us to-day, and the veteran's children can look upon them as a memory of the eventful past. The dead are living in our memories to-day. As we look upon the young and handsomely uniformed citizen soldiers as they escort the veterans to the last resting place of our departed comrades, we cannot help drawing the distinction between their elastic and vigorous step in exact time, and the unsteady lines of the old, grey haired, limping veterans who followed. A quarter of a century ago these brave men marched in quick time to the rattle of musketry and the boom of cannon and shell, amid the groans of the dying and the yells of battle frenzied. We see them to-day in that upright strength and valor, not the broken and bent forms they present to-day. Wherever we see an old soldier of the rebellion, we think only of the glory that surrounds him, and make it the means of loyal enthusiasm as well as poetic feeling and fancy. In a few years but few of the men of "62" and "65" will remain—will be only a memory. Every passing year makes their number less. The great fiat will in a very brief number of years muster out the last veteran of the war, and those who are now babes will only be able to point to the monuments of Memorial Day. Possibly there may be here and there a lingering grey-haired and infirm veteran of the ranks that even to-day show that they are not now so full and strong. The grave stones are thickening that bear the names of the survivors. The American people realize what a noble monument to this republic are the graves of the soldiers who stood the battle shocks of "61" and "65."

A large number of the wheel-horses of Republicanism met on Tuesday evening and took the preliminary steps towards the permanent organization of a National League. The lessons of the past show the necessity for this timely action. The great secret of Democratic perpetuity can be attributed to the thorough organization that has been kept up by that party. For years—nearly a quarter of a century—they met national defeat, only to appear again each succeeding campaign with even a more perfect organization. No party has ever lived through such defeats; and organization has been the secret. Minorities have often been victorious by organization. At this time there is only one object in view by Republicans—the welfare of the party and the nation. With such an organization as that contemplated, harmony and success is assured the grand old party. There was at the meeting mentioned the greatest unity of sentiment. It was apparent that only a patriotic spirit prevailed. There was an entire absence of any individual or personal interest. It is proper that the capital city should take the lead in effecting a State permanent organization upon an impartial basis. The fact that some Republicans may be led off through the medium of other political movements, is quite sufficient reason for the prompt action of the patriotic Republicans to circumvent such a course. It must be patent to all that the "People's Party," "Alliances," "Labor Leagues" are but devices of the Democracy to weaken the Republicans, while the Democratic ranks remain intact. When our Republican brothers discover this they will be likely to return to the fold, and organization is the only way to bring this about.

The last bulletin from the census department discloses some valuable information concerning foreign, national, State and county indebtedness. The United States indebtedness in 1880 was $1,922,517,364; in 1890, $915,962,112—a decrease of $1,006,555,252. The county indebtedness of the various counties in the United States show an increase of $17,845,818. From statistics of foreign countries, during the last decade, it appears the aggregate increase of the indebtedness is $2,154,503,655. In France the debt per capita is $116.35; Great Britain has a per capita debt of $87.79; Russia, $30.79; Austria-Hungary, $70.84; Italy, $76.06; Belgium, $63.10; The Netherlands, $95.56; while the United States has but $14.63, and the debt is nearly one-half made up of non-interest-bearing notes. In the last ten years the United States has reduced its per capita debt from $38.33 to $14.63. Aggregating the national, State and county indebtedness, the per capita has decreased from $46.59 in 1880, to $20.45 in 1890. At the same proportionate decrease, in another decade the country would be relieved from its national, State, and county indebtedness, if they could be distributed for that purpose. In 1880 California had a debt of $3,141,811; in 1890 the debt is $2,527,624. The per capita for California in 1880 was $3.63, as against $2.09 in 1890. The county indebtedness for California in 1880 was $7,312,489; in 1890, $5,281,324. The bonded debt of Sacramento county in 1880 was $686,800, which has been reduced only $26,300 in the last ten years, leaving the debt still $660,500. Los Angeles has a debt of $739,500, as against $682,311 in 1880. Nevada, Amador and Santa Barbara are nearly out of debt. There is no showing for San Francisco.

It is apparent that the people of the east hold our wines in higher estimate than we do. President Francis D. Clark, of the New York Society of Associated Pioneers of the territorial days of California, writes us from New York: "During the past five years the only wines used at the annual dinners, January 18th, of this society, are California wines. When Mr. John S. Ellis was the president of the society he opposed the use of any other wines, and the rule is still adhered to." In his letter, Mr. Clark encloses an editorial from the New York Herald of the 13th inst., as follows:

Californians have neither lacked eloquence nor modesty when describing the gorgeous products of their sunny hill-sides and valleys. It has been especially impressed upon us that the excellence of their wines is unequalled; that the vintages of Europe find favor in this country only because we are undeniably prejudiced in favor of everything foreign. And yet, with all this coruscating, crackling oratory in the air, it is reported that at the banquet board [in San Francisco.—ED.] where the President was recently an honored guest the wines used were not Californian, not the product of home industry, but the result of pauper labor in France. We hope the report, which has been given wide circulation and excited considerable astonishment, will be thunderously denied. To give the President a bird's-eye view of more and better grapevines than he ever dreamed of, to beg him to protect this important home manufacture, and then when he asks for a glass of wine to draw the cork which has a foreign maker's name on it—this is odd and incongruous enough to excite a smile.

For ourselves, we confess to great admiration of California. Its grapes are so luscious that we wish our throats were a mile long, that we might enjoy their sweetness all the way down. And its wines, many of them, are fit even for an American to drink, whether he hails from the White House or elsewhere. If the Californians can't agree with us in these matters, then we must extend to them our most courteous condolences.

We have periodical spasms of virtue and morality. Every few years there arises a clamor for great moral reforms. With some, the present is always the climax of immorality. While it is true that our community would be better if there were less intoxicating liquors used over bars, as a matter of fact there is no greater degree of immorality than in the past. We would like to see some radical changes in the matters of regulating saloons. Indeed, some radical regulations are necessary in order to get rid of the disreputable dives that foster under the name of saloon. But this is a subject that demands thoughtful consideration, in order to avoid discriminating between those engaged in the liquor traffic. It is a difficult matter to say who shall, and who shall not receive the license of the law to conduct saloons. Just where the dividing line should be drawn it is not easy to decide. The trustees have made an attempt to adjust this situation by the selection of the Mayor and Chief of Police as a quasi excise committee. This is a proper decree, and from an impartial investigation a way out of the difficulty may be developed. There are some people who are entirely too virtuous, and to them can be credited the greatest drawback to judicious reform.

There is a perfect avalanche of literature in the periodicals treating of the condition of the unfortunate; a writer in the May Arena follows up the subject with many terse thoughts. Last week we devoted some space in the discussion of pauperism in this country. We give below an extract from the Arena:

When we glance at the way in which the churches practically carry out the teachings of Christ in regard to the mutual relations of men, it is not difficult to explain the loss of faith among large numbers, especially of the poorer classes. We see at once why the churches are repelling the vast number of people known as the "masses." They are not in sympathy with their needs, their suffering, their obstacles and their aims. What wonder that faith is lost in anything supernatural! The life-conditions of swarms of people around us are fearfully hard. They labor from one year to another, with no hope of competence or even of decent comfort. Tens of thousands in our large cities are engaged in a daily and pitiless struggle with hunger, cold and nakedness. Recently I saw a young mother with a baby in her arms, whose husband was sick, evicted from a tenement for non-payment of rent. This is not unusual. Such a family have no credit. Everything they get is under the hardest conditions. They have to buy coal by the pail, and thus pay double and treble what is exacted of well-to-do people. Food and furniture come relatively high. They are sometimes intemperate, usually ignorant and often shiftless.—but whose duty is it to help and educate them? Poverty leads to vice quite as much as vice to poverty. During the past season there came under my observation a pale, slender girl, whose wistful eyes told of hard struggle and scant pleasure, engaged in making scarfs at thirty-five cents a dozen. This involves much labor, which three years ago easily brought a dollar a dozen. Each season, as more hungry applicants have competed, the price has fallen. The economic law rendering it desirable to buy cheap and sell dear applies to labor and makes no account of taking advantage of necessity. Many people are living in an environment that stunts all growth, physical, moral and spiritual. Women with weary, hopeless mien, and children whose pinched, wan faces seem to be a silent reproach for the misery of centuries, in which so many have been crushed down and outwitted in the struggle for subsistence. These women and children are to day dragging out their meager lives in many a wretched hovel and stifling tenement house. They are sick and in prison, but how few have visited them. Under the fierce competition of modern society, the weak and unfortunate are hopelessly crowded to the wall.

There is plenty of work for the philanthropist here.

Our merchants and shop keepers who have a fixed place of business are required by ordinances—city and county—to pay a license tax for this privilege. In some cases this license as exacted amounts to a tax on labor as well as home productions. As an illustration, butchers are required to pay a license where they have a fixed place of business. In this case it is a tax on labor as well as the productions of the State. Now, when this license tax is enforced, there should be some protection against itinerant hawkers and peddlers. When those having a fixed place of business have to bear the burdens of this tax, they should not be brought into competition with the itinerant peddler who is exempt from license tax for peddling the products of the State or of his own labor. We notice that the butchers have to bear this competition as there is an itinerant concern which goes from door to door with butchers' commodities. The Board of Trustees and Supervisors should see to it that a sufficient tax be exacted from them.

Old Maids in Literature.

It is a curious fact that three of the most successful and eminent literary women in England—Miss Austen, Miss Edgeworth and Miss Mitford—should have been typical old maids; not merely unmarried through stress of intervening circumstances—ill health, early disappointment or a self-sacrificing devotion to other cares—but women whose lives were rounded and completed without that element which we are taught to believe is the main-spring and prime motor of existence. To understand how thoroughly this was the case we have but to turn to a later and very different writer, Charlotte Bronte, who married when she was 38 and died one year afterward, and whose literary life was accordingly passed in spinsterhood. Yet if that very grave and respectable gentleman, the Rev. Mr. Nicholls, had never appeared upon the scene at all it would have been impossible to call Miss Bronte a typical old maid. She had the outward signs of one, indeed, the prim demeanor, the methodical habits, the sarcastic attitude toward the male sex, but burning in every fiber of her being and evident in every page of her writings is that fierce unrest, that inarticulate, distressful longing of a woman who craves a mate. We can easily imagine Elizabeth Bennett and the very sensible Elinor Dashwood, and even Emma Woodhouse, dearest and brightest of girls, slipping from their lovers' grasp and growing into old maids as charming as was Miss Austen herself; but poor, plain Jane Eyre and that insignificant little school-mistress, Lucy Snowe, are shaken and consumed with the passion of their own desires. Such women cannot walk from the cradle to the grave handling their lives with delicate satisfaction and content; they must find what they need or die. It is amusing to note how the various critics and biographers of Miss Austen, Miss Edgeworth and Miss Mitford have debated and fretted over the painful lack of romance in their careers. Feminine critics especially find it difficult to believe that there is no hidden tale to tell, no secret and justifiable cause for this otherwise inexplicable behavior, and much time and patience have been exhausted in dragging shadowy memories to light.

An Erroneous Derivation.

"Rodomontade" means "bragging," and comes from Rodomont, king of Sarza or Algiers, in Boiardo's "Orlando Innamorata," and Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso." Like the word "hectoring," "rodomontade" is a most unjust imputation on the hero from whose name it is derived, for Hector was no scold and Rodomont no cowardly braggart. The latter prince was famous as the lover of Doralis, princess of Granada, who, however, deserted him and eloped with Manricardo, king of Tartary. Having a quarrel with Rogero, he challenged the latter at his wedding and was killed; but there is nothing in either the challenge or the fight to justify the conception of him as a sort of Eastern Bob Acres, big at talk, but with a valor that oozed out at his finger nails when it really came to fighting. Dryden, in "The Spanish Friar," conveys the proper conception of Rodomont when he gives utterance to this sentence: "Why so meek? I am sure I quake at the thought of him. Why, he's as fierce as Rodomont."

SOME UNWRITTEN HISTORY.

Sacramento in Embryo—How Government was Established from Chaos.

PART XIX.

The City Council met again December 3, 1849. The Trustees passed an ordinance to establish a graveyard, and to regulate interments. Section one provided that "from and after the passage of this ordinance the square donated by John A. Sutter and H. A. Schoolcraft, south of G street, between Ninth and Eleventh streets, shall be a public graveyard where the bodies of deceased persons shall be buried; nor shall any interment take place in any other part of this city, under a penalty of $80 for each offence." Section two provided that "said graveyard shall be laid off in a suitable manner, by a committee to be appointed by the President and Council, which shall report to the Board, and, if adopted by them, shall be final, and be recorded in the Recorder's office of this district." Section three provided that "family burying grounds shall be of convenient size, which shall be sold for that special use, the Council reserving the right to require uniform improvements." Section four provided for a public plat, the graves of which were to be uniform and not more than two feet apart. Section six provided that "the President of the Council shall make and deliver the deeds on receipt of $10." The graveyard was placed by the Council in charge of the President until the next election of Councilmen; and it was ordered that no person was to be buried there without a coffin, and all paupers were to be buried at the expense of the city in graves not less than four feet deep.

The Council also passed an ordinance for cleaning and keeping clean the public landings and streets, providing that "it shall not be lawful for any person to erect or continue any tent, shed, house, or shanty on any of the streets, public landings or other public property in the city, under penalty of $50; and for every day's continuance after conviction an additional $100 was to be assessed. It is not recorded that there were any convictions under that ordinance, but it is quite probable that it was more or less effective in securing streets and landings to the use of the public.

At this session of the City Council the Harbor Master reported that he had collected harbor dues to the amount of $209.70, and paid it over to the Treasurer. The Harbor Master reported that a vessel had been sunk at the foot of I street, which was referred to a committee composed of Councilmen Rogers and Chapman.

The Board again met December 6th, and having under consideration the request to Governor Riley that he furnish $7,000 to aid the city in the construction of a hospital on the north side of the plaza, between I and J, Ninth and Tenth streets [see Part XVIII of this series, THEMIS, Feb. 28, 1891], determined that $7,000 was not a fair share of the cost, and authorized the President to ask $12,000 as the proper contribution of the State in constructing a hospital so necessary in the case of the sick of the city and of the emigrants then thronging our streets, many of them without means.

The expenses of the city and county for the indigent sick was reported to be from $300 to $500 per day. In addition to this public expense, the Masons and Odd Fellow continued their ministrations to the members of those orders, their headquarters being at Sutter's fort under charge of seven trustees, three Odd Fellows and three Masons, the seventh member being both a Mason and an Odd Fellow.

The Council again met December 8th and proceeded to allow certain bills—one of A. M. Winn for $801, but no mention is made of the services paid for. At this meeting of the Council Caleb T. Fay petitioned that body to secure for him a berth for the bark Orb, the one she then occupied—until the first day of April then next, which petition was granted, thus taking that case out of the rules established by ordinance for other vessels as to the time they might lay at the public levee.

The next meeting of the Council was on December 12th. It had been found that the ordinance concerning auctioneers, and fixing their bonds, was too burdensome, or perhaps the auctioneers found it to their interest to evade the payment of their percentage, and they had influence enough with the members of the Board to secure an amendment at this meeting to the effect that the fourth section of the ordinance to raise revenue for the city of Sacramento "be and the same is hereby suspended, so far as it relates to the bonds and oath of auctioneers." And on motion of Councilman Kewen section seven of the order was suspended so far as the same related keepers of coffee houses. On motion of Councilman Chapman it was resolved by the City Council "that all persons taking out licenses for retailing liquors be permitted to keep a boarding-house and to retail liquors under the same roof; that a license issued to a hotel or boarding-house keeper entitles such person also to the privilege of retailing liquors in connection with his legitimate business. Furthermore, when two or more classes of business are carried on in the same building by the same person it shall be required of him to pay but one license; provided, however, that nothing in this resolution shall be so construed as to embrace gaming tables, or any species of gaming, or to conflict with the ordinance relating to auctioneers." It is well that the term of office of the City Council was near its close, or the provisions of the ordinance would have become too complex to fully understand and apply them.

It was evident that money was flowing into the city treasury about this time, as at this session of the Council, on motion of Councilman Kewen, it was resolved that each member of the City Council be entitled to receive from the Treasurer of the city the sum of one hundred dollars per month for his services. It will be remembered that the City Council at the time of which we speak (December, 1849,) was mainly self-constituted, most of the members elected August 1st had resigned or been expelled for non-attendance. They were living in flush times, and they had no constitution or State laws to regulate their action. Indeed, there was no tribunal to review their acts, no courts except those constituted to aid them, no guide to their conduct in precedent or statute, and that was enacted and enforced which that tribunal willed. It had command of the treasury, and the vaults of that office opened at the beck and nod of the City Council and money was distributed as the Council willed, limited only by the amount of money which could be collected, mainly from licenses and harbor dues, as the scheme of taxation of realty and personalty could not be enforced. So the City Council determined that the laborer was worthy of his hire, and we may be quite sure that thereafter if there was a shortage in the money on hand the loss would fall on some creditor not so near to the vaults of the treasury as were the members of the City Council.

The City Council again met December 15, 1849. There was at this time little use for a City Assessor of real estate. There was no means of enforcing such assessment. The City Council itself must necessarily terminate its labors in the near future, as the first Legislature of the State met on the 15th December, and the city must secure a legal charter from that body, and so Ambrose Hadley, the assessor of real estate, tendered his resignation, which was by the Council laid on the table. The City Council no doubt had in view the future prosperity of the city as well as its present good, and schemes were projected to that end as well as for the gain of its members and others, for, on motion of Councilman Chapman, it was resolved that A. M. Winn or his assigns be authorized to erect a hall over his bath-house, to be erected at the north end of Third street, in the city, for the use of the Odd Fellows, Masons and the City Council. We take it for granted that it was the hall, not the bath-house, that was for the use of the Council, Masons, etc. But notwithstanding the resolution, the bath-house and hall were never built, and the Masons, Odd Fellows and City Council had to meet elsewhere. At this meeting the City Council appointed Messrs. Miles and Rogers a committee to procure a room for the use of the Council.

The City Council also, on motion of Mr. Rogers, at its meeting of December 15th, Resolved, That we have seen with deep regret a large population coming into our city without means to support themselves, a great number of whom have died for want of shelter and proper attention. That we are under the disagreeable necessity of requesting Governor Riley to appropriate at least the sum of $12,000 out of the hospital or unappropriated fund in the hands of the government for the purpose of relieving the sick as far as possible, and for the purpose of erecting a hospital in this city, which is now under way and may be finished soon with governmental assistance. That the President immediately proceed to Monterey and present these resolutions to Governor Riley, and that he be authorized to receive and receipt for such amounts as the Governor may in his judgment see fit to appropriate; and that the President (A. M. Winn) be authorized to draw on the treasury of this city for the amount of his expenses to Monterey and back.

But if the President of the Council went to Monterey on that business he did not report that fact to the Council. Governor Riley could not legally appropriate moneys in his hands to build a hospital for the city, and that movement came to naught. Peter H. Burnett was then Governor-elect for the State of California, and a communication was received from him on the subject of city hospital, and at the meeting of January 2, 1850, ordered filed. The contents of that paper cannot now be given, but we may be sure that no funds were forthcoming either from the general government or the State for such a purpose, as the matter was not again referred to in the City Council. At the meeting of the Council December 15th the accounts of Doctors Boiller and Wright and Dr. Snider were referred to Councilmen Rogers and Miles, and the account of Mr. Eastman for making a seal for the city, amounting to $100, was allowed. This seal is not now in the possession of the city authorities, and we can get no impression of it to show device engraved on it.

At this meeting J. L. Chapman resigned his place as member of the City Council, and Thomas A. Warbass was elected to succeed him. The name of this latter gentleman filled a large space in the public eye at that time, and his name appears in many of the abstracts of title to our city lots as a member of the firm of Warbass, Heyl & Morse. The Council did not again meet with a quorum until January 2, 1850.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

She—Is Jack trying for the chorus? He—Well, he must be if they are at all sensitive.

The reason it is so hard to speak of a musical composer's work as a whole is because it is generally in pieces.

M. Ambroise Thomas, the veteran composer of Hamlet and Mignon, is slowly recovering from a serious accident which nearly cost him his life.

"I think," said the disconsolate farce comedian, "that I will go and get vaccinated." "What for?" "To see if I can't find something that will take."

The latest realistic triumph is the introduction of a real sawmill into a new drama. Playwrights with any regard for the laws of copyright will please not monkey with the buzz-saw.

Henry Irving's revival of The Corsican Brothers at the Lyceum Theatre will be memorable for its scenic splendor. This production and Ellen Terry's appearance in Nance Oldfield were the chief dramatic events of the week.

Adelaide Ristori, the great actress of a former generation, is nearer 70 than 60 years of age, but, says a Roman correspondent, is still a beautiful woman, with voice strong and clear, her fine figure straight and graceful, and face neither wrinkled nor yellow.

Thomas A. Edison says his idea of producing a Shakespearian drama by electricity is practically developed, and will be placed on the stage very soon. In the same general line is a new device, upon which he is now working, to throw pictures on a curtain and make them gesticulate and talk like life. This invention, he says, will do for the eye what the phonograph has done for the ear, and with it will be combined the principles of the phonograph. By this device the electrician will be able to catch the gestures and expression of a man or woman walking along the street, and reproduce them on canvas. The man with the kodak may begin to tremble for his occupation.

The manuscript of The Merchant remained in the hands of a New York manager for a long time. The day Miss Morton received her work back from the manager, she went into a stationer's store on Broadway, bought a stamped newspaper wrapper, put it around The Merchant, and addressed it to the editor of the New York World, and then in an indifferent manner placed it on the top of a street letter-box, giving it no further thought until she was notified that among over three hundred competitors her play, The Merchant, had been awarded the prize. That the management and present owners of The Merchant exhibited good judgment in buying the play is evinced by the fact of its success at the Madison Square Theatre.

Billy Florence, the actor, when last in Chicago, says the Post, related with no little unction the following tale, which he declared had never been in print: "It occurred a number of years ago," he said. "I was on my way with my company from New York. On the train I had struck up an acquaintance with a pretty little miss just entering her teens, and it was not long before we became fast friends, although neither of us knew the other's name. Just before we rolled into Chicago I caught her looking very intently at me, and I asked her what she was thinking about. She blushed as if detected in a guilty act, but upon my repeating the question she said hesitatingly: 'Nothing very much, sir. I was only thinking how much you looked like somebody.'" "Who is it?" "I asked 'Oh, I don't like to tell you,'" she replied. I again asked her to tell me the reason. "'Because,'" she replied, "'he is not a nice man. He is only an actor, and his name is Billy Florence.'" "

A man who drops into poetry is not hurt much if he touches the soft, spring sort.

The Missouri professor who wrote an essay on "How to Manage a Wife" has applied for a divorce.

Mrs. Davis, in her "Memoirs of Jefferson Davis," pays a deserved tribute to the women of the Confederacy. These women, says Mrs. Davis, knitted like Penelope from daylight until dark. They did it not as a pastime, but to clothe their families and the soldiers. On one occasion the Hon. W. C. Rives made his appearance at the Davis mansion in such an elegant and perfectly fitting suit of gray that some of the young men suggested that he had run the blockade. Mr. Rives overheard the remark, and proudly exclaimed that his wife had knitted every stitch of the garments. She had the yarn spun and dyed and even knitted covering for the buttons. It took close inspection to see that they were knitted, as they appeared to be very fine cloth. During the war Mrs. Robert E. Lee, while a victim of rheumatism and confined to her chair, found time, with her daughters, when they were not busy in the hospitals, to knit 196 pairs of socks and gloves for Posey's brigade. Mrs. Mary Arnold, of Cowden, Ga., in 1863 made 1,028 yards of cloth, besides knitting gratis socks and gloves for the soldiers.

The story comes by mail from Paris that a rather well-known French bean who prides himself upon his knowledge of the world was presented not long ago to Amelie Rives-Chanler, and at once became rather empress in his attentions. Mrs. Chanler at first took them in good part, but when monsieur insisted upon being her devoted admirer on all occasions, and even manifested a desire to seek tete-a-tetes with her, he at once became odious in her eyes. Drawing herself up, she administered a rebuke to him in this way: "Sir, I do not think that you know who I am!" But not in the least abashed, the gallant Frenchman retorted: "Mais, madame, I know it vair well; you are ze author of ze 'Quick.'" "

The first thing Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher ever wrote for publication, says the New York Continent, was in 1859, when she was lying on a sick bed, and, to pass away the time, she wrote what afterwards grew into the story "From Dawn to Daylight." These were sketches of Western life, many of them drawn from her own experience. The sheets of paper upon which the story was written were thrown into a bureau drawer without any thought on the part of the writer of ever making any use of them; but one day her daughter, a young girl of about 12 years old, came across the manuscript and became so much interested in the story that she begged her mother to have it published. "And for that, my first production, I received $500," she added.

In the year 1781 Cowper made the acquaintance of Lady Austen, who suggested to him the writing of "John Gilpin" under the following circumstances: Cowper, as is well known, suffered from religious melancholy, and to divert his mind from the gloomy thoughts which were oppressing it, Lady Austen related to him an amusing story about a certain Mr. Beyer, an eminent linen draper who lived at the end of Paternoster row, London, where it joins Cheapside. This so tickled Cowper's fancy that in the course of a single night he twisted it into "John Gilpin," which has ever since been so popular and stirring to the minds of children and "children of larger growth." The story, by the way, bears a strong resemblance to the honeymoon adventure of Commodore Truncheon in "Peregrine Pickle." Mr. Beyer died in 1791 at the age of 98 years.

"The Genius of Galilee," by Anson Uriel Hancock, is an historical novel of peculiar interest. The author's treatment of his subject is bold in its aggressiveness; while he claims to advance nothing startlingly new, his methods are novel and instructive. The divinity of Christ, the inspiration and authenticity of the Scriptures are topics which have been almost written and discussed to death. A work of this nature will naturally collide with many opinions; yet those who take any real interest in matters of this kind will do their own thinking and arrive at their own conclusions despite the apparently convincing proof of truths attested in the work. The novel is comprehensive and scholarly and epitomizes many views and holders of the various thinkers in this particular field. Throughout the Christian world there is steadily accumulating a large and valuable literature treating almost entirely of a new spiritual world, molding the minds of many into new vistas of thought and speculation. Its general disposition is broad and liberal yet for all truly spiritual and godly. In the "Genius of Galilee" a thoughtful mind finds food for wide and ample thought, the trend of which will be most edifying.

General Benjamin F. Butler, it is said, has determined to signalize the close of his public career by publishing a book. It will be the record of a long, stormy and varied life of one who has had an unusually extensive experience in politics, in law and in war. General Butler has succeeded in making possibly as many, if not more, bitter enemies than any man in public life during the latter half of the nineteenth century. He is a man of intensely strong feeling. His hatred for a foe is as implacable and unrelenting as his love for a friend is fervid and sincere. His forthcoming book will be interesting, as it will deal with men and measures that have come within the sphere of his own personal experience. The friends of the old warrior anticipate its publication with a great deal of pleasure, but his enemies do not share that feeling. They apprehend, and with good reason, a flaying-alive process. The old man will pillory these unfortunates without the slightest regard for their feelings, and will enjoy the fun. The old-time proverb about the desire one has to induce one's enemy to write a book, that he might in so doing dig the pit into which he must inevitably fall and cover himself with confusion, does not apply in the case of General Butler. His book will be a snare in which his enemies will surely be caught. It will arouse a cyclone of criticism, a wordy warfare as savage and vindictive as any that ever characterized a truly Christian campaign in medieval days.

Dr. Talmage forgets that this place of worship is already continuously occupied.

At a Louisville prayer meeting one brother prayed that the Lord "would carry the lambs in his bosom, and lead them on to greater victories." Another that "the wheels of the gospel chariot should go to the hearts of sinners." Still another asked the Lord to be "a father to the fatherless and a widow to the widowless." It is well for brethren who lead in prayer to be careful to avoid set phrases, however finely they may sound.

An old Illinois farmer has come to the conclusion that Mr. Blaine will be the next Presidential nominee of his party. The old man put two scarecrows out in his field—one he named Jim Blaine, the other Ben Harrison. There have been several thunder showers in that vicinity this spring, and the lightning has struck the Jim Blaine scarecrow three times, while the Ben Harrison scarecrow has not even been made damp by the showers. The old farmer is confident this is a direct pointer as to the outcome, and is willing to bet on it.

A man who has been spending the season in Florida tells of a cracker preacher who came to the little church in the pine woods at Altamonte the other Sunday and delivered a very feeling sermon. He was a thoroughly earnest, sober, well-meaning man, and he did his best to impress his audience; but when in his sermon he delivered himself as follows, his northern hearers were perhaps not impressed the way he wished them to be: "Now, there's my wife; she's one of the best women that ever lived, she is; and every day of her life, when she gets her chores done up, she goes inter the closet, shets the door, and prays. Now, do you s'pose you could stop my wife er prayin'? No, sir! you couldn't stop er prayin' not if you was to give her er dollar er day! No, sir! Rev. Howard MacQueary, the alleged heretic, during his recent visit to Chicago, related in the Leland Hotel an incident of his trial. "During its progress," he said, "I entered the rotunda early one morning and sat down in a chair next that occupied by a nervous little man. He was in a brown study, from which my presence roused him. 'Papers come yet?' he inquired, seeing one in my hand. I nodded, and he jumped up, saying: 'Must get one to see how MacQueary is getting on. Take any interest in the case?' I nodded again, and he moved away with the remark: 'Great case,' and 'great fellow, that MacQueary. Smartest little chap ever came around these parts.' Feeling somewhat complimented, I smiled and was about to introduce myself when he burst out: 'Say, do you know what I'd do if I had a head as full of brains as MacQueary?' I shook my brainy head, and he replied, slapping his knee: 'Play suckers for all they're worth, and take life easy.'" "

Looking at the authentic hat of Daniel Webster in a Boston hat store window one feels as one does in looking at the armor of some old warrior of the middle ages, which nobody could so much as stagger under now-a-days. There is no one now to draw the bow of Ulysses or wear the hat of Webster. Undeniably it is a shocking bad hat, but how many hair-brained statesmen of the present day would be tickled to death to be able to wear it! It would be a good idea for some of the brilliant caricaturists of the Paint and Clay Club to represent the whole congressional delegation from Massachusetts standing up under that great square-crowned hat. One doesn't wonder that even Carlyle, the Scotch Therites, stood aghast before the bow that this ancient hat covered, and exclaimed: "There is your Yankee Englishman!" Carlyle records the incident himself, and it seems that he was so much taken aback by the suggestion of power in Webster that he couldn't say anything contemptuous of him, and was obliged merely to content himself by getting in a little hit at the whole Yankee race, intimating that they were only a variety of Englishmen.

The man who complains that the world does not appreciate him, should not lose heart. If every one were justly appreciated by the world very few of us would be riding in our carriages.

The enjoyment of wealth is another delusion. Some there are, who may be able to avail themselves of a literal enjoyment of wealth, but the great majority of wealthy men are actually prohibited from such pleasure as wealth ought to furnish. A majority of our millionaires are too much absorbed in the process of retaining their wealth ever to have any real pleasure of the world.

There are seasons when a fellow would like to be able to go to some quiet nook, lie on his back in the balmy breezes, and just idle his time—indulge in absolute laziness. The great difficulty arises, however, in the fact that few persons are able to throw dull care to the wind. When we are rich enough to do this, there is always some other care that interposes and prevents the free action of the will and mind. When we are in limited financial circumstances, it is impossible for the ordinary mind to discard that fact, or to forget that there is always a pay-day at hand. By the way, is there any such a thing as the enjoyment of absolute idleness?

Criminals and paupers can be prevented from setting sail for America by the simple knowledge that they will not be received on this side. There can be no danger of international complications in a policy so clearly dictated by justice and reason. The law of self-preservation is paramount to all technical interpretations of international treaties. The restriction of American immigration to classes that will make desirable citizens is forced upon this nation by the grossest abuse of American hospitality. A cordial welcome is still open to the thrifty and honest immigrant from whatever clime, and his interests in his new home will be best conserved by rigidly excluding paupers and criminals.

While a fair young daughter of York, Pa., was serenely seated in her aerial bed-chamber the other night, weary with the toils of the day, about to doff her wrap and lay herself down upon her couch to enjoy the kindly embrace of Morpheus, she suddenly heard a strange noise, which affrighted and almost bewildered her. It was that of an old family clock which had been stored away in the room. Its truthful tones had not been heard for half a century, when all at once its wheels began to vibrate, and the old familiar gong sounded out the time of night—11 o'clock. It did not strike or "tick" again, but stopped, not to go again. The alarm is a mystery, and the timid lassie awaits in breathless silence the sequel of the occasion.

A curious relic of the war is in possession of Charles F. Gillet, of Cleveland, who values it highly, says the Union Veteran, of that city. It is the honorable discharge of a faithful dog owned by Mr. Gillet's father, the animal having served for three years in Battery H, Independent Regiment, Pennsylvania Light Artillery. The discharge recites that "Jack Puppy (brindle)" is a "watchman" in Captain E. H. Nevins's company, that he was enlisted January 21, 1862, for three years, and was discharged June 10, 1865, at Camp Barry, D. C., by reason of expiration of term. He was born, according to this record, at Alexandria, Va., and was four years old at the time of discharge; with a yellow complexion and brown eyes, and was by occupation when enrolled "a fighter." The discharge is duly signed by E. H. Nevins, Jr., Captain commanding battery, and by I. A. Torrence, mustering officer, Lieutenant Second United States Artillery.

CHECKMATE.

Fifty years ago, in Mehemet Ali's time, Suleiman Pasha, a naturalized Frenchman, was commander-in-chief of the Egyptian artillery, and universally acknowledged to be the best chess player in Cairo. As a soldier he stood in high favor with the court as well as with the people; for in the war waged by the sultan of Turkey against Mehemet Ali in 1839, the Egyptians owed their victory in the notable battle of Nisib to the prompt decision and strategy of Suleiman Pasha. The Egyptian army had already taken to flight, carrying its commander, the heroic Ibrahim Pasha, away with it, when suddenly, as if by magic, the battle took a favorable turn, changing the fleeing masses into pursuers, who succeeded in completely vanquishing the Turkish troops. This blow proved fatal to Mahmood, the unhappy sultan, whose supreme power hitherto had been unquestioned. He took the loss of his brave army so much to heart that he died of grief barely a week afterward.

When peace had succeeded war, Suleiman Pasha returned to the city of the caliphs to enjoy there his favorite pastime of chess. Punctually every afternoon he made his appearance in a cafe situated on the banks of the Nile, where on the terrace under the shade of mighty palm trees a seat was specially reserved for him, and there he fought a daily battle with the venerable Ulema, Reshid Aga. The field upon which the battle was fought was the 64 black and white squares of the chessboard, where ivory armies strove with each other, each trying hard to decoy the other into some hidden trap. They only ceased when the evening twilight descended, and when the cry of the muezzin from the minaret of the mosque called the faithful to prayers, to resume it again the next day, and to continue for weeks and months, until one of the combatants was defeated. But it was never the Pasha who was beaten, though Reshid Aga was not only highly considered on account of his great learning, but also far-famed for his masterly playing of chess.

The two masters were generally surrounded by all the best players of Cairo, who followed their moves with eager and attentive looks. One afternoon while Suleiman was waiting for Reshid Aga a stranger stepped up to him and addressed him as follows: "Pasha, may I propose a game of chess to thee?"

The persons who as usual had gathered round the latter, were so much startled by this unexpected proposal that their chibouks nearly dropped from their grasp, while a gray-bearded Cadi was almost choked in the act of gulping down his Moca. For who could be so daring as to venture to challenge the conqueror of Reshid Aga?

Suleiman Pasha, however, only casting a searching look upon the stranger, quietly replied: "I am at thy service. What is the stake thou art accustomed to play for?"

"For nothing the first time; for a great stake the next. But it is for thee, Pasha, to name the stake now."

"A hundred ducats won't be too much, then?" Suleiman Pasha replied, again looking inquiringly at the stranger, whose face remained quite unmoved while he calmly took his place.

The board was brought and lots were cast for colors; the Pasha drew black, the stranger white.

A great crowd of enthusiastic spectators soon gathered round the players. After the very first moves it was clear to all that they had a master player before them. The ivory figures seemed to grow into life in the hands of the stranger; it was as if real soldiers moved on the black and white squares, blindly obeying the commands of their leaders. Suleiman Pasha also soon became aware of the crushing power of his adversary; he felt as if the grip of an iron fist held him in bonds. In vain he tried to shake off his opponent; vain was his sacrifice of knight and castle; the stranger's power did not seem to weaken a bit. The Pasha sat in deep, earnest thought; opposite to him the stranger, calm, but with a proud look, like the marble statue of a commander-in-chief.

A gleam of joy spread suddenly over the Pasha's features; he saw the chance for a capital move, and, quite excited, he placed his queen right in front of his opponent's queen. A murmur of discontent arose among the spectators; the game seemed lost for the Pasha; he must have overlooked that his queen was left unprotected. The face of Reshid Aga, who also looked on, beamed with pleasure; at a glance he had thoroughly mastered the combination of his friend. The stranger took a much longer time to consider than usual before he slowly lifted his lean hand.

"No doubt he will take the queen," the spectators whispered to each other.

"Then he will be mate in eight moves," Reshid Aga said, gleefully rubbing his hands.

"And if he does not take her?"

"Then he will lose his own."

For a moment the stranger appeared undecided; but suddenly like lightning his hand descended on the board. Quietly and calmly he moved one of his pawns a square ahead.

All looked surprised at each other, muttering: "To lose the queen is losing the game!" while Suleiman Pasha, smiling triumphantly, removed the hostile queen from the board.

The onlookers, who mostly sided with the Pasha, breathed as if they had been relieved from a heavy load. In their opinion the game was decided, for White could not hold out without his queen. Several of them were already on the point of withdrawing, when they were suddenly startled by the clear ringing voice of the stranger, who called out: "Mate in twelve moves."

Suleiman Pasha's looks grew dark—the smile died on his lips. A change had as suddenly overcast the features of Reshid Aga. Almost beside himself, he jumped on a seat to follow the game from a more elevated point, while the spectators, barely daring to draw breath, counted the moves as they followed each other.

With masterly skill White now led his force into the field, encircling the hostile king in a powerful grasp and keeping him within an iron ring. At the tenth move the Pasha tried to break through the blockade by sacrificing his queen, but in vain. White declined to accept the sacrifice, and moved his knight with "Check to the king." Eleventh move! The spectators, whose excitement had now reached fever-heat, saw that their Pasha, never before vanquished, would be checkmated the next move. Suleiman's king was compelled to withdraw into a corner, and with the twelfth move, as he had predicted, the stranger pronounced "Checkmate!"

A murmur of admiration was heard from the spectators, while the Pasha sat there with bent head, as if trying to search in his memory, when suddenly, as if a thought had flashed upon him, he turned upon the stranger. "Once already in my life," he said, "I have seen chess played in the manner in which thou hast played to-day. The masterly moves are not unknown to me, but I was unable to resist them. The game, however, which was then played before my eyes was a great deal more beautiful even than to-day. Guns of the heaviest calibre represented the castles, fleet cavalry were the knights, and in place of the pawns well-armed infantry formed the vanguard. And when the guns on the one side thundered their 'Check' to the other, the ground beneath our feet seemed to shake, as if burning lava was thrown from a volcano."

"At that time we stood opposed to an army of one hundred and fifty thousand men, a terrible number, which, led by the genius of a single man, threatened to crush us completely. And this man whose genius made our brave soldiers take to flight, and whom it was impossible to withstand, was a son of the cold north. It was only to the recklessness of Halfiz Pasha, the Turkish commander-in-chief, who envied the youthful genius his brilliant success, and who, though fully warned, wildly pursued the Egyptians, that we owed the victory of Nisib, which otherwise we never should have gained."

The Pasha stopped, and casting a long and penetrating look on his adversary, suddenly cried out enthusiastically: "Stranger, thy incomparable play to-day recalls to my memory afresh the game of chess at Nisib and its skillful player. Only one man can play like that, and that man is—Col. Moltke!"

"Thou hast hit it, Pasha," the stranger calmly replied. "My name is Moltke."

This, indeed, was Count von Moltke. While a young man he went to the east, and was in the service of Sultan Mahmood from 1835 to 1839. He was present at the battle of Nisib, when, as above said, the Turkish commander-in-chief, jealous of the great abilities of the young soldier, refused to follow Moltke's advice, and so lost the battle.

The editor wrote it correctly: "Let the galled jade wince." But this is the way it appeared in the paper: "Let the gallon jug wait."

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Fakir on June 1st and 2d. This is said to be a clever comedy company. The Eastern press is favorable in its criticism of The Fakir.

Vernona Jarbeau gave us Starlight on Thursday night. If Vernona Jarbeau expects ever to see daylight, she had better get something besides Starlight. However, the little artist had some new features this trip.

"The villain still pursued her." Thatcher's Minstrels filled the Clunie Opera House last night. There is a sprinkling of old-time minstrelsy which will always possess a charm. Thatcher, Dockstader and Shepard are a team. We tire of the article now called negro minstrelsy. Thatcher and company again at matinee and to-night.

The Robert Allen Case.

It would seem from the developments that have been made in the Robert Allen assault case, that it is about a counterpart of the Tullis murder in 1878. In both cases the prime mover remained behind the scenes when the culminating act was committed, and in a position that suspicion would not reasonably point to him; the real work upon the victims—what might be termed the manual work—was performed by others than the ones whose brains conceived the plot. In the Tullis case Clark originated the scheme, Dye, Anderson and Lawton, the associates. While the case is generally known as the Dye case, it is manifest to those who knew him that he was led into it, and suffered because of his official and social prominence. Lawton was an astute criminal; Anderson, an ignorant foreigner. In that case Lawton escaped punished by flight, and Clark by his tact and reticence. In the Allen case Smith was evidently the brains, yet most of his subordinates have been schooled in crime—perhaps one of the lot may be entitled to the commiseration that he was weak and blindly led.

"Jack and Jill."

The term, or phrase, "Jack and Jill," so well known in modern days in connection with one of the best known and most popular nursery rhymes, evidently took its origin from two liquid measures bearing the same name, and commonly in use in former days. "Jack" was a pitcher made of waxed leather, and a "Gill," or "Jill," was, as now, a metallic measure of capacity. "Wherefore," says Grumio, in "Taming the Shrew," "be the Jacks fair within and the Gills [jacks] fair without," meaning the leathern jacks clean within and the metal Gills polished without. These became representative of the two sexes, as in the proverbs, "Every Jack must have his Jill," and "A good Jack makes a good Jill." Some say the probable origin of the nursery rhyme itself is that it is a humorous personification of the two vessels, which some one had accidentally upset.

Boys, when you choose a wife, look out for these two or three things: Is her hair nice, sweet and kissable looking? How few girls have kissable hair! Are her dresses neat and nice around the edges, and what about the inside edge of the white skirt? Oh, dear, yes; you are sure to see it some time—when she steps into a car or out of an omnibus. When she gives you a letter to "just post this for me," is it stamped? Oh, but girls are unscrupulous about stamps. Is she on time and with gloves on for the theater or concert to which you take her? How about the lace in the neck of her dress? Oh, you want to notice these things when you think of marrying.

LIFE IN NEW YORK CITY.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS FROM THE BUCKEYE STATE.

The Political Situation in Ohio—American Good Nature at Steamship Departures—The Man Who Makes His First Trip Across the Atlantic.

[Special Correspondence of THEMIS.]

Two very ordinary looking men stood together at the entrance to the Fifth Avenue Hotel last Wednesday, and engaged in a subdued, but earnest conversation. One of the men was ex-President Rutherford B. Hayes and the other Governor James E. Campbell, of Ohio. Mr. Hayes has come on from his home in Fremont, Ohio, to attend a meeting of the Slater Fund Commission. He has none of his old-time vigor and cheerfulness. His face is drawn and haggard, and he walks with feebleness and apparent labor. He said he had recently suffered a severe attack of la grippe, from which he had not yet fully recovered. That was easy to believe, and his appearance testified to the truth of his words. He declares that his memory has failed him, and that he cannot remember the most trifling matters. On the subject of the Slater Fund he refused to give any information, saying that he did not think he was authorized to do so. Relative to the political situation in Ohio, Mr. Hayes was as reticent as a clam at high tide. "I refer you to the New York papers for all political information," he said, "they are quite as conversant with matters in my native State as I am." On general principles the ex-occupant of the White House has for many years refused to talk politics to any one—a wise policy for a man in public life who does not wish to be quoted.

Governor Campbell was in a more communicative mood than his fellow-state-man. "Ohio politics," said Mr. Campbell, "are precisely the same at the present time as they were six years ago, when I was in New York. That Major McKinley will be nominated next fall by the Republicans for Governor of Ohio is a foregone conclusion. The present outlook in Ohio is extremely favorable to the Democrats. The Republicans have everything at stake in the coming Ohio campaign, and if they lose the State their chances of electing the next President will be very materially lessened. If they wish to remain in the Presidential race at all they must hold Ohio. The Democrats can, on the other hand, lose the State without crippling their prospects in the national contest. The Democrats will, I firmly believe, carry Ohio by a big majority next November." Governor Campbell, in all probability, will be the Democratic opponent of Major McKinley in the Ohio gubernatorial combat. Both Cleveland and Hill are popular among the Democrats of the Buckeye State, according to the Governor, and as a Presidential candidate in 1892 either of these leaders would have a large following. At the same time the Republicans are laying very low, and it would not surprise a few people—Governor Campbell among them—if they held a Presidential dark horse in reserve.

The annual exodus to Europe of those who can afford the luxury (and their name is legion) has begun unusually early this year. The steamship companies report that over one thousand cabin passengers left on the five steamers that sailed from New York last Wednesday. Ordinarily, and before the heated term arrives, ocean voyages are classified into four groups—first, second and third class, and steerage passengers—later on in the season, however, when the rush for foreign fields is at its height, one is fortunate to secure so much as standing room in the vessel's hold, unless he has been far-sighted enough to procure a stateroom during the Christmas holidays. It is the sad experience of more than one person who has postponed buying his ocean passport until the day before sailing, to find that the cosy little berth which he fondly imagines he is entitled to and has paid for, is in the hands of some person of greater premeditation, who secured an option on the bunk while it was below cold weather par. The re's small satisfaction to be had in the reflection that some one else is reaping the profits of an early investment which you are convinced rightly belongs to you. Of course, one naturally cries out against the greed of a corporation which willfully defrauds its patrons by false representations. When such an event arises you go at once to the captain of the vessel and lay the matter before him. You swear, by all the gods in the Grecian mythology, that you picked out and paid for the lower berth in stateroom number 53, which you now find occupied by a man who stoutly refuses to be ousted. You are immediately assured, in terms of torturing politeness, that a terrible mistake has been made at the company's office, and with a thousand apologies you are shown to a stateroom, the only unoccupied one in the boat, and usually the worst, and—there the matter drops; you stop swearing, and go on deck for a smoke, and (if you are philosophical) forget all about your recent troubles.

There is a great deal of jollity in a steamship departure. The proverbial good nature of the American crowd is under no other circumstances so well exemplified as when one of the big ocean greyhounds is about to cast off her moorings for a run across the great salt pond, and friends gather around to bid each other au revoir. One of the amusing and instructive sights of a steamship departure is the man about to make his maiden trip across the brine. His antics touch the pinnacle of the ridiculous. He is always recognizable by his attire. Usually he wears a large, canvas-covered cork helmet. On one arm he carries a woolly Scotch shawl and a heavy Mackintosh coat; on the other a steamer rug, a new blanket and a linen "duster." In his right hand he grasps a fancy leather traveling bag. His left hand is encumbered with a three-jointed telescope, two stout umbrellas, an assortment of canes (some half dozen varieties, perhaps) and a box of smoking materials. Across his left shoulder will be slung a pair of field glasses in a bright, new sole-leather case; across his right shoulder a knapsack, containing— heaven only knows what number of perfectly useless articles. From the pocket of his Cape Cod blouse two or three notebooks may be seen peeping out. Your traveling tyro is always excited, and does an almost superhuman amount of bustling about without any apparent purpose. At the very outset he gets into hot water. He begins by tumbling into the wrong stateroom, where he carefully arranges his household goods about in the most orderly and artistic fashion. When he has decorated his cabin to suit his own aesthetic taste, the steward's mate raps at the door and tells him that he has made a mistake in taking possession of the room he occupies, as it belongs to an elderly maiden lady, who just then comes upon the scene and scowls at the rash intruder. His baggage is unceremoniously dumped out on deck, and later on is thrown helter-skelter into the right compartment. It is a fact often observed that your novitiate voyager is never seen on deck from the time the vessel passes Sandy Hook until land is touched on the other side of the water. What he does below can only be conjectured. Certain it is that he never displays his expensive outfit on deck, and his $5 steamer chair grows rusty at the hinges for want of use. Taken all in all, the man who strives to pass himself off for an ocean traveler while making his first trip, is an object that would raise a grin on the face of old John Calvin himself, were he alive to enjoy the sight.

In marked contrast to the people who "go down to sea in ships" for the first time are the old-timers, who "run across" year after year. They come aboard about three minutes before the steamer casts off her moorings, saunter leisurely on deck, nod familiarly to the Captain, light a cigar and repair to the smoking or reading room. They are usually attired in their ordinary business clothes, and are not overburdened with the gimcracks of travel. After they are well out at sea, they hunt up their respective cabins, see that their few traps are snugly stored away and then refresh themselves with a nap. Their perfect ease and nonchalance is very galling to the feelings of the tyro, especially when at the end of the voyage the old traveler looks into the pallid face of the ocean neophyte and remarks: "Delightfully easy trip that, wasn't it? Never saw the water so smooth before in my life!" When all the while the inexperienced one knows that as sure as drowning the old ship would have gone to Davy Jones' locker if the wind had blown a twentieth of a mile harder.

The facilities afforded by the present system of rapid transit in New York are wholly inadequate to the demands of the traveling public. During certain hours of the day, when the rush for home or business is at its height, all the available means of quick transportation are taxed to their utmost capacity. The elevated roads have long since proved their inability to carry all the passengers who would like to patronize them. The extension of the present roads, or the provision of some other means of travel, has become an imperative necessity. Give us more elevated railroads, is the cry. At the same time, a great many people oppose the erection of any more aerial roads on the ground that they are greater nuisances than conveniences and permanently disfigure the city. Underground roads have been shown to be a practicable means of rapid transportation, but the expensiveness of such an enterprise in New York city would make it a well-nigh impossible undertaking. Subway transit has its drawbacks too, of which smoke, darkness and a greater liability to accident are not the least. Electric cars and cable cars are probably the coming methods of conveyance. A great many things can be said in favor of the cable and electric cars. They have all the advantages of the pokey horse-car with none of the latter's inconveniences. They can attain a high rate of speed and be stopped at will. This, however, will be declared to be a decided disadvantage to some. Whatever new methods are adopted they will be hailed with delight by many thousands whose cars are daily being trodden upon by fellow passengers in the over-crowded cars. New York wants rapid transit, and it wants it at once.

Deafness is on the increase in this town. I am assured by an eminent expert in auristics that failure of acute hearing is more prevalent here in New York than in any other thickly populated city on the globe. And no wonder, for Gotham is unquestionably the noisiest city in the world, not excepting London, Paris and Berlin. Day by day this overgrown village becomes more noisy and restless. The byways as well as the highways are full of the wildest kind of clamor. Interminable sounds of every conceivable description fill the air. The loud bellowing of street vendors (of every degree of lung power), the interminable racket of elevated roads and surface cars, the rumbling and bumping of a thousand or more ponderous trucks, carriages and wagons, the clang and clatter incident to the rush of business, and the shrieking of factory whistles, together with a million other sounds heard in large cities, become in New York a pandemonium in its highest state of development. In some of the smaller, down-town thoroughfares, where the press of business is greatest, the din reaches a point of exaggerated Bedlam. Conversation between pedestrians is out of the question. In the afternoon, the yelling of the news-boys forms no inconsiderable portion of the general uproar. Any one of these young newspaper fiends would outscreeam the loudest-voiced man in the Stock Exchange. It would not be a matter of very great surprise to me if the entire population of New York should some fine morning wake from their slumbers to find themselves deprived of their sense of hearing. Perhaps the punishment would be a just one for persistence in living in the dizziest, dirtiest and most dinful of modern cities.

The spoon fad is the latest caprice of the ennuied elite. It is now quite the proper caper to present the girl you hope to be divorced from some day with a dainty little spoon, appropriately carved in the handle and engraved in the bowl. These spoons of infinite variety and design—are much used as wedding and birthday gifts. I made an effort to trace the origin of this newest fad the other day, and appealed to the proprietor of one of New York's biggest silversmithing concerns for assistance. I was unsuccessful in locating the fad's starting point, but I picked up some tid-bits of information about the spoon that may interest THEMIS readers. It seems that the spoon is anything but a recent invention, as many rare specimens of this indispensable table utensil still in existence antedate the Christian era. Some of these early examples of the spoon-maker's art are extremely beautiful. One which I had the pleasure of examining was made during the reign of King Henry VII. It was of purest gold, exquisitely modeled with delicate ornamentation and rich chasings. Designed for the use of pampered royalty, it seemed too frail and beautiful a toy for the soft caress of even a princess's lips. The very first spoons were of lead, and clumsy, uncouth things they were. The spoon figured quite frequently and conspicuously, too, in certain religious rites of ancient times. Long before spoon-collecting and spoon-giving was adopted by a society as a pleasing pastime, lovers of the beautiful began to gather in the quaint and curious specimens to be picked up in European bazars and curio-shops. In the Metropolitan Museum of Art may be seen some of the rarest and most superb examples of spoons to be found in the world. Strange to say, many of these first spoons compare favorably with the best work of English, French and American silversmiths of to-day. All in all, the spoon is an object of interest for many reasons, and this new spoon fad is a highly interesting and commendable one.

I was not a little amused the other day by watching a game of shrewdness played by a couple of Gotham's typical street Arabs. They were only two dirty little urchins, who looked guileless enough as they strolled along, apparently oblivious of everything about them. As a matter of fact, however, they were sharply watching something a considerable distance in advance of them. That something was revealed later on. The two lads suddenly separated, the youngest darted to the opposite side of Broadway, and walking rapidly forward a block, quickly recrossed the street and returned on the same side from which he started, fetching up in the rear of an elegantly dressed gentleman, attired in the newest of new spring suits and jauntily swinging a heavy silver-mounted cane. Daintily the exquisite picked his steps through the grime, when the gamine behind him suddenly stumbled, and falling against the gentleman's cane sent it spinning into the middle of the street, where it lay half buried in the mud. Apparently halfscared to death, the clumsy lad took to his heels and was soon lost to sight in the crowd. At this critical point in rushed gamine number two. Recovering the mud-reeking cane, he carefully rubbed it clean on his ragged coat-sleeve, and with a look that was saintly in its innocence and a grace that was Chesterfieldian in its elegance, handed the unsoiled walking stick to its owner. To say that the well-dressed man was both pleased and surprised by this exhibition of gallantry from a ragamuffin is to put it mildly. Tossing the boy a fifty-cent piece, the man of good clothes ejaculated, "By Jove," and passed on. Later on I passed through one of the cross streets in time to see the young rascal of the cane-rescuing affair and his accomplice each enjoying a huge slice of pie, purchased out of the proceeds of their clever little ruse. "Jimmie," I heard the young Chesterfield exclaim, "dere's no use talkin', but dis racket of ours is a dead straight snap. Dere's millions in it! Gimme some more pie, cully." May 23, 1891. M.

An Indian Challenge.

Two tribes of Indians in the upper part of California had as boundary between their districts a low ridge where the streams headed. If you should go to where one of these streams, Potter river, rises, you would see still standing a tall pile of stones beside a never failing spring. On one side of this cairn was the territory of the Pomo Indians, and the other the land of the Chumia. These tribes were enemies, and were often at war. When the Chumia wished to challenge the others to battle, they took three little sticks, cut notches round their ends and the middle, tied them at the ends into a faggot, and laid it on this cairn. If the Pomo accepted the challenge they tied a string around the middle of the three sticks and left them in their place. Then agents of both tribes met on neutral ground and arranged the time and place of battle, which took place accordingly.—St. Nicholas.

William Tell may be a myth, as the Swiss government now maintains, but the people of that republic keep on putting up statues of him. A fine one in bronze has been offered to the city of Lausanne by a Portuguese Jew now living in Paris, M. Osiris Iffia, but the citizens are uncertain whether they ought to accept it or not as the would-be donor does not enjoy the highest reputation. The city of Nancy, in France, however, took without hesitation last year his gift of a statue of Joan of Arc.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of J. C. Bainbridge, an insolvent debtor. J. C. Bainbridge having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said J. C. Bainbridge is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the county of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal of the said debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the county of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court room of said Court, on the 10th day of June, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M., of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the county of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. Dated, May 11th, 1891.

W. C. VAN FLEET,

Judge of the Superior Court.

WM. A. GETT, JR., Attorney for Petitioner.

SUMMONS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county. The People of the State of California to Helen A. Grant, Allen D. Grant, Edward N. Grant, Catherine Matzen, Mary M. Miller, John Doe, and Richard Roe, greeting.

You are hereby notified that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the county of Sacramento, State of California, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 25th day of January, 1891, in which action EDWARD DIETERLE is plaintiff and you are defendants.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: The said action is brought for the purpose of quieting the title to that certain piece or parcel of land situated, lying and being in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, and State of California, and described according to the plan of said city, as the south twenty (20) feet of the west sixty-eight (68) feet of lot number one, in the block bounded by J and K, and 5th and 6th streets; for the purpose, also, of determining all adverse claims of the said defendants to said property; and for a decree of said Court, declaring and adjudging that the title of plaintiff to said premises is good and valid, and that neither the said defendants have, nor any of them has any estate or interest in the same; and forever enjoining and debarring the said defendants, and each of them, from asserting any claim to said land adverse to plaintiff, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made.

And you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said county of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, W. W. Rhoads, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand [SEAL.] and affix the seal of said Court this 20th day of February, A. D. 1891.

W. W. RHOADS, Clerk.

A. L. HART, Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PIONEERS.

Roster of the Living and Dead Members of the Sacramento Society—Names of Some Distinguished Men—Organization of the Sons and Daughters.

The last roster of the Sacramento Society of California Pioneers was published in 1877; since then important changes have occurred, and very many of the Argonauts have passed away. Feeling that in time the Society may become extinct, and with a view of arranging for the proper disposition of its property, a meeting of the Society was held February 28th, and it was determined to invite the sons and daughters of the Pioneers to form a corporation that will in future time take the place of the present organization. The report of the committee of the Society was published in detail in THEMIS on March 7th. In pursuance of this recommendation a meeting of some of the sons and daughters was held, and an organization effected. In the meantime a revised roster of the members present and past was prepared, and it will be issued in pamphlet form by the Society. We present the list below, as we deem it of historical and permanent interest.

Miss Leila J. Lindley, Secretary pro tem. of the Sons and Daughters of Pioneers, has sent the following to the press for publication:

There has been a society formed here called the "Sons and Daughters of Sacramento Pioneers." The duties of the members of the new organization will be nominal at present, but at such time as the Society of Sacramento Pioneers shall cease to exist, the Sons and Daughters will assume all responsibilities and inherit all property, including the lot in the City Cemetery, which the new society pledges itself to keep in good order.

That all sons and daughters of living members—and of deceased members who died in good standing—may be given the opportunity to join the new society, this article is published, inviting all to send in their names before the 6th day of June, 1891, when the charter closes, as all charter members will be exempt from initiation fees.

The installation of officers will take place Saturday evening, June 6th, at 8 o'clock, in Pioneer Hall. All communications after that date must be addressed to the new Secretary, Miss Anna Luther, 1626 G street, Sacramento.

Persons under 18 years of age are not eligible to join the society. Parents must join in order to admit grandchildren. No other notification will be given to join the society other than this invitation, which will appear once in each of the daily papers of Sacramento.

The list of the Pioneers contains the names of very many distinguished men—men who have been United States Senators, Congressmen, Governors, State Legislators, Judges, journalists, authors and warriors. It was carefully compiled by the committee, and all available data obtained. It has, of course, been impossible to trace out some who removed in early days. We had occasion to search out the identity of some of the members, noted among the early dead. Among others James E. Birch, the date of whose death in the roster printed in 1877, is —, 1857. Birch is now about forgotten; he figured prominently here in the early '50s. He was the owner of the old Adams & Co. building, on the west side of Second street, between J and K. The building was erected during the fall of 1853, by the house of Adams & Co., at an expense, including the ground, of $85,000. Birch afterward became the owner, in 1855, of the property. Of him an early city directory says: "In connection with the name of Mr. Birch, it is but due him to state that he is the pioneer stage proprietor of California, and from his success in this business may be attributed the organization of the California Stage Company." This company was organized in 1854, with a capital of $1,000,000. In 1856 they had 1,100 head of horses, 80 Concord coaches, and 125 Concord wagons. They ran 24 stage lines, and covered a distance of 1,474 miles daily. It was perhaps the most extensive stage company that has ever existed. In 1857 Birch left for the East, and was on the ill-fated steamship Central America when she went down off Cape Hatteras. She carried some 600 persons, and about three-fourths were lost, together with perhaps more treasure than in any vessel in modern times. When it was apparent the vessel was doomed, and the passengers were making frantic efforts to save themselves, it is related that Birch was asked why he did not attempt an effort; he replied, "I can't swim; what's the use?" The last seen of him, he was coolly standing at the railing, with his coat buttoned up, and smoking a cigar, when the steamer sank.

It is customary for the Emperor of China to offer prayers every New Year's Day for the welfare and bright prospects of his subjects in the eighteen provinces of his empire. At the ceremony eighteen pairs of candles are burnt, and the name of a province is marked on each pair. Any of the candles that burn badly signify that such provinces as are named thereon will suffer great calamities—sickness and the like.

The decision of the Supreme Court affirming Judge Hunt in the case of Bates vs. Gregory, is of importance to this city. While the amount involved in this particular case is not great, the principle established is of value. As the matter now stands, the statute of limitations runs against bonds more than four years over due. Some years ago there was a decision of the old Supreme Court which declared that the statute of limitations did not run against coupons of the bonds of 1859. This was against the settled doctrines laid down by the Federal Supreme Court, and owing to a mistaken policy of our city authorities this determination of our State Supreme Court was allowed to stand without invoking the Federal Court. This cost the city $400,000. The present Supreme Court has determined that over due coupons do not bear interest, and it is by the same rule of action settled that over due bonds will not draw interest. The bond creditors may yet find that notwithstanding the fact that the old Supreme Court afforded them much consolation—and coin—the Court as at present constituted has a tendency to give the people a little justice in the matter of these iniquitous bonds. There is no funding scheme available for the bonds of 1859. What will be the situation of these bonds when they become due? According to the late ruling, if they are four years over due the statute of limitations runs against them. In 1888, $320,000 of these bonds became due; on January 1st, 1892, they will be barred. The question arises: "How are the bond creditors going to prevent the statute from running?" There is no provision made for their payment or funding, except under the act of 1858, and it is difficult to see what remedy the bondholders have in this matter other than to depend on the Interest and Sinking Fund provided for by the act of 1858. When we contemplate that it takes all the accumulations of this fund to meet the interest, and that there is no Sinking Fund unless there is some other resource, the bonds will be barred before there are any sinking accumulations. The city cannot be sued on these bonds, nor is it subject to any process, mesne or final in relation thereto, and unless the creditors can invoke some means to create a fund for the liquidation of these bonds, or their funding, before they are barred, they will be at the mercy of the city. From this standpoint the recent decision of the Supreme Court is far-reaching in favor of the city.

The curiosities of crime have furnished material for very many interesting books, and the works on criminal jurisprudence are perhaps the most entertaining reading in law. This county has furnished many noted cases, and we will refer to a few of those that transpired during our connection with the courts. The case of Charles J. Flynn, alias Mortimer, who killed Mary Gibson, attracted a great deal of attention at the time. Flynn was a native of Lynn, Mass., and came from excellent family. He early embarked on a career of crime, and became one of the most dangerous criminals on this coast. In 1872 he came to Sacramento in company with a woman named Carrie Spencer, and they lodged at an I-street hotel. Visiting Mrs. Gibson's saloon, back of the station house, Mortimer knocked her down with a broken beer glass, horribly disfiguring her face, and, after a desperate struggle, she was killed. The premises were then pillaged, and, woman-like, Carrie Spencer took away wearing apparel belonging to the dead woman. Clenched in the hand of the corpse was a mass of whiskers, and that furnished the first clue. Mortimer was arrested, and it was found that the whiskers corresponded with those he wore, and that his face showed that he had recently had a considerable quantity of his beard pulled out. Afterward the Spencer woman confessed, and testified against Mortimer. He was convicted and hanged. A remarkable feature of the case was the attempt made by his brother to rescue him from the county jail. The brother was a business man of Lynn; he came here unknown, scaled the jail wall, rang the bell in the jail yard, concealed himself until the jailer passed by to the yard door, and then entered the jail through the open door. He was observed by the jailer and mortally shot, but ran the length of the corridor, and fell dead at the cell door of his brother. Mortimer then exhibited evidences of violent insanity, and kept them up to the very last. It will always be a mooted question whether his mental derangement was real or simulated.

Filomena Cotta and Domingo Estrada stabbed John Cruse to death, and robbed him, on the night of April 7, 1874, at Front and N streets. There was at first no clue, but after the pair was arrested and placed in separate cells, the result followed that is almost universal in cases where more than one are implicated—one became alarmed lest the other would make a statement in his own favor. Both made confessions, and each tried to throw the responsibility on the other. A very bitter feeling was engendered between them, and they did not become reconciled until they stood upon the gallows. After their limbs had been strapped Cotta requested that his arm be released for a moment, and he extended it to his companion and, shaking his hand, remarked that it was time they made up. The Troy Dye case is familiar to our readers. The first clue in that case was a piece of redwood board that had been a portion of the duck-boat that conveyed the assassins down the river. Written on the wood were some lead-pencil figures that were identified by a salesman in a lumber yard. From that it developed that the lumber had been taken to Dye's house, where the boat was constructed. The confessions of Dye and Anderson followed soon after their arrests, but when the trial of Clark came on both declined to testify against him, and he escaped punishment. The Lowell murder case is another striking illustration of the danger to criminals to have more than one concerned. Confessions were made immediately after the arrests, and the criminations and recriminations afforded the officers full light on the tragedy.

The Robert Allen assault case is no exception to this general rule, and it has applied to the most astute and experienced criminals. In the murder case of officer Scott four convicts with records were the perpetrators, yet two of the three captured made extended confessions. The other held out stubbornly, in the face of the knowledge that there was sufficient evidence against him to send him to the gallows. He was finally permitted, however, to take a life sentence with his companions. The case of Zwalt, the murderer of his wives, presents some remarkable features: He was beyond fear of detection, and the knowledge of his crimes would have died with him had he not years afterward made a voluntary confession. It is evidently a case of troubled conscience, and thinking about the matter has unbalanced his mind; yet it is apparent he was not laboring under a hallucination, as his story is corroborated in the East. Such cases have occurred before, and it has even been that men have confessed to crimes they had no connection with.

There is much to commend in the vigilance and zeal of our police department of late. Some splendid work has been done. The officers have brought down some big game. This is work worthy the dignity of officers. In place of devoting their time and energies to taking some poor unfortunate mongolian for selling a ten-cent lottery ticket, or some weak, frail woman for infraction of the ordinances relating to houses of ill fame, our officers have looked to the welfare of the community in capturing those dangerous criminals who are a terror to all. It looks like our officers are beginning to realize what constitutes the duty of a peace officer. The settled condition of the department no doubt has much to do with the present efficiency. When the officers are not disturbed with the thoughts and expectations of removal, and the uncertain tenure of their office, they are in a position to do better work. It was the original intention of the police law to make the officers of the department permanent, and not subject to this annual change. The present officers evidently feel that their tenure is safer under the existing rule than heretofore, which may be a reason why they enter into the spirit of their work with more energy. We say to the officers, Chief and Captain of Police, well done! Go on with your good work, and there will be little cause for complaint hereafter. Rid us of the vicious, dangerous criminals, and we will have no serious complaints of those petty offenders that seem in the past to have absorbed the entire attention of the department.

We have been disposed always to be just, and to render credit where it is due. It has often happened we have felt ourselves called upon to defend the police department from unreasonable and unjust assault by citizens who are unfair enough to adversely criticize without knowledge of what they are talking about. A favorite hobby with some is the gambling question, and it would seem that with some of the more narrow-minded, the entire energies of the police should be directed to protect the idiots who seek out faro games and lose their money.

Every man charged with crime is presumed to be innocent until the contrary appears by competent testimony in a Court of the land. Every person charged with a public offense is entitled to counsel and a fair and impartial trial. It is too common for public sentiment to be unduly excited at times, and incline to pre-judge those suspected of crime. Trifles light as air are often magnified into proof strong and convincing. We often hear from unthinking—we might say unreasoning—people, that certain parties ought not to be allowed a trial; that no attorney should defend them. Some are so radical that they pronounce an attorney dishonest who is called into one of these cases which public sentiment has magnified into the class of desperate. It is the duty of a lawyer to labor to free his client; of necessity he can do this with a clear conscience and with absolute composure. A lawyer trains himself to think and speak only on the legal aspect of his case. Whether his client did or did not do anything does not concern him in the least. The question with the lawyer is whether it can be proven. If it cannot be established by competent evidence, then per force the client is not guilty, and it is here the lawyer performs his labor—that labor for which his careful and critical training fits him. Recently an outrageous crime has been committed in our midst. Certain parties have been accused of complicity in the commission thereof. We hear frequent expressions that none of the parties accused should be granted a trial, but dealt with summarily. Others go to the extent of unfavorable criticism of attorneys who are employed to conduct the defense of the accused. This is un-American. Whatever may be the individual opinion of the citizen, it is not just to condemn a person unheard. Circumstances may point very strongly towards the guilt of a party, and yet a full development of the facts disclose his absolute innocence. Public sentiment should never deprive a fellow-being from a fair and impartial trial, as well as the aid of counsel.

So far from insisting on the same stereotype modes of thinking and forms of speaking in all his pupils, the teacher should encourage all that variety of expression and action which suits their diverse natures, and which alone sets naturally and gracefully upon them. A machine can manufacture machines to order, all after exactly the same pattern; but it takes a man to educate men after the original and diverse patterns, according to which they were created. Socrates put himself on the same level with his pupils; was himself as much a learner as any of them; assumed to know as little as any of them; and so, by that method of question and answer, which has ever since been called the Socrates method, he sat down with them, and examined each topic as if it were entirely new—worked out each problem with them as if he knew no better than they to what result it would lead. The teacher should be always a learner, always an inquirer after new truths, or new views of old truths; or, if he must in any instance travel in just the old beaten path, he should always travel it with the same fresh and eager curiosity as if he had never traveled it before. He must never grow old in his methods, still less in his feelings and sympathies. In the province of teaching, and indeed in the whole realm of intellect, just as in the kingdom of heaven, he that would be greatest, must be constantly becoming as a little child. Socrates put his mind in direct communication with the minds of his pupils. He taught them much that was in books—the whole range of literature and science—but he never taught it from or with books. He first appropriated, digested, incorporated, the knowledge of whatever kind with the very elements of his spiritual being; and thus having made it his own, he was then prepared to guide and aid his pupils in doing the same.

All influence that would be powerful must be more or less personal. Mind must grapple directly with mind. Spirit must inter-penetrate spirit. In each conversation—lesson, it might be called—Socrates began with the simplest elements of the subject, took nothing for granted, and never proceeded a step farther than the pupil understood, and was prepared to give his intelligent and cordial assent. And thus he went on, adding question to question, and building one lesson upon upon another, like the series of demonstrations in Euclid's geometry, till the pupil was master of the whole. He taught but one thing at a time, looked at one thing in every possible light, brought up all the difficulties that were connected with it, and then returned to the starting point and went over the whole ground again in the additional light thus shed upon it. In short, he seems to have adopted the same method in which God taught the old world by the prophets, and indeed always teaches men by his providence and spirit; "line upon line, line upon line, precept upon precept, precept upon precept, here a little, and there a little." And if there is any one thing in which great teachers have excelled more than in anything else, it is in this method of thorough and patient investigation adapted to the knowledge and capacity of the particular pupils now under instruction, however great the apparent loss of time, and their repetition and review, re-repetition and re-review, till the whole science or subject, whatever it may be, is not only at their tongue's end, but inwrought into the very structure of their minds, and part and parcel of themselves.

It will be seen at once that in order to secure the full and perfect application of these Socratic ideas and methods, the teacher must not have too many pupils; the school must be small, or must be subdivided into small classes. And this is greatly to be desired for many other reasons, among which we only specify the great value to each individual of the process of personal recitation in giving him command of his faculties, readiness and felicity of expression, and in general executive power. The Socratic method is especially adapted to private instruction and home education. There is nothing to prevent private tutors, governesses and parents (unless it is their own personal incompetency), from adopting this method to the full. And this is one great recommendation of home education, especially for young children. With proper instruction in the Socratic method they may learn to speak foreign languages just as they acquire their vernacular tongue, and may drink in the arts and sciences just as naturally, almost as unconsciously, as they eat and drink and converse about the fireside. These brief and disconnected ideas are thrown out not as rules to be adopted without discretion and applied without discrimination, but as hints that can be hardly otherwise than food for thought to the reflecting mind, fruitful in suggestions to the wise, helps in self-education and in the education of others, to discriminating and aspiring teachers who would make the most of the best that there is in them in one of the greatest and best of the professions.

A housewife has contributed to one of the numerous journals that devote themselves to ameliorating the condition of her sex a heartfelt protest against the practice of early rising. She contends that if there be anything in the world that a woman needs it is rest. "If she feel tired and languid in the morning, and hate to get up, it is a sure sign that she is overdoing and wearing out. Six o'clock is as early as any one ought to get up and go to work." If a languid feeling in the morning be a sign of wearing out, the marvel would be that the major portion of the sex did not wear out generations ago. Moreover, these same symptoms have from time immemorial been so hopelessly chronic with the masculine sex as to suggest that men likewise have been overworking themselves, in accord with the alluring but perilous notion that it is better to wear out than to rust out. It is a curious fact that the whole trend of proverbial philosophy upon this subject has been in the direction of instigating people to commit the indiscretion of early rising. They have been promised health, wealth and wisdom, if they would only do violence to one of the most clearly defined instincts of our common humanity and arise in the morning with the lower orders of creation, and especially with certain birds, which, from their exposed mode of living in the open air and sunshine, are necessarily awakened at an early hour, and are therefore entitled to no laudation whatever for their conduct. It is refreshing to find some one with sufficient independence of mind to step out of the beaten path and put in a word in behalf of a judicious indulgence in slothfulness.

JANET'S ROUGH LESSON.

Judge Seaton had arranged to take his daughter to Long Branch for the season, and he invited Janet to accompany them. Janet was a beautiful girl, graceful and well bred, and the Seaton's fancied her; and the Judge, being a remote relative of her mother, felt it a kind of duty to look after Janet a little and to do what he reasonably could for her.

"'Twill do the child good," he explained to his wife; "and no one knows what a pretty girl may accomplish in the run of a Long Branch season."

Mrs. Seaton elevated her delicate brows in well-bred surprise, but she was too amiable and lady-like to raise any objection to her husband's will, so the matter was settled.

On the very afternoon before their departure, while Janet was packing her crisp muslins and her one silk, an old camphor-wood box arrived. Captain Larrimer, of the brig Nautilus, brought it down. He had just got into port and had spoken with the White Swan on his homeward voyage. Jack Hilliard was first mate on the Swan and sent the old sweet-scented chest as a present to Janet. They were not formally engaged, but they had been lovers ever since childhood, and Janet wore Jack's plain gold ring on her engagement finger. Jack never forgot her, and now he had sent the camphor-wood box over the seas as a birthday present.

But Janet was too much excited, too full of her trip to Long Branch to notice it. She went on with her packing, and when Tom Seaton, the Judge's handsome son, drove down to take her over to the Cedars, she hurried off, not even pausing to bestow a glance upon the queer old box. When Janet had fairly gone the old farmer shouldered it and carried it up to her chamber.

"Ah, my girl," he muttered, "ye'll be glad enough to come home to Jack's box by and by—this sudden fever'll soon burn itself out."

Janet found her sojourn at Long Branch perfectly entrancing; the gay company, the balls, the music, and more than all else, Tom Seaton's constant and flattering devotion, bewildered her brain and silenced both conscience and common sense.

From Long Branch the Judge's party went to the mountains, and one hazy September afternoon Janet found herself all alone with Tom Seaton in one of the most romantic haunts of the Catskills.

"What in the world makes you wear this old fashioned ring, Janet? Is it a love gift or anything of the kind?"

"No," replied Janet, coloring with embarrassment. "Then let me take it off and put something prettier in its place."

Janet was too weak, too fond of flattery to resist, but a sharp pain pierced her heart as he drew the plain gold band from her finger and put a costly diamond in its place.

"Now, that's something like," he said. "You must wear it for my sake, Janie, and I'll keep this."

He dropped Jack's ring in his pocket, and Janet sat silent, a vivid remembrance crowding through her mind of the night Jack put it upon her finger. Poor Jack! Her eyes grew dim with tears as she thought of him, but she made no effort to remove the flashing diamond.

The season was over at last, and the travelers turned their faces homeward. It was the middle of October when Janet returned to the farm-house. Farmer Gresham was busy gathering in his store of grain, and his thrifty wife was up to her eyes in her preparations for winter.

After the first greetings were over, Janet ran over to her own chamber, with its sweet and simple appointments. She sat down on the snowy couch and looked about her. Not an article had changed, and there in one corner stood the old camphor-wood box.

A vague curiosity stirred the girl's heart as her eyes fell upon it. What had Jack sent her, she wondered, and she glanced down at the showy diamond with a sudden pang.

Presently she stole down to her father's chest and obtained a hammer and chisel, and then she set to work at the battered lid.

The box was lined with silk, and emitted a quaint odor. Down in the very bottom she came to a marvel of loveliness. A snow-white shawl, with long-trailing fringes and a web of folded silk that gleamed like the bosom of a swan; and deeper still a little casket, and in it a lace veil that looked like a film of moonlight, and a string of great milky pearls, as lustrous as Eastern moons.

There was a strip of paper, and scrawled on it were these words:

"My darling. When I come home, I shall ask you to be my wife; and if you say 'yes,' these may help for your wedding things."

Janet let the battered lid fall, and dropped her head upon it. Then she broke into a storm of passionate tears. Poor good Jack, and she had forgotten him and given away his ring! Then she went on with her sobbing till the sound of a voice below interrupted her—Miss Tabitha Turner's voice raised to a high pitch.

"Yes, it's so, an' no mistake! Jake Miller got here this mornin', and he was pilot o' the White Swan, ye know. He says she tuk fire in the mid-ocean an' every soul was lost 'cept the second mate, Joe Jarvin, an' him. Jake says that poor Jack worked like a hero, but he saw him go down wi' his own eyes. Poor Miss Hilliard's like one crazy sence she's got the news."

The girl rose to her feet and crept down to the sitting-room with a face like death.

"Tell me the truth," she gasped. "Tell me, mother, what is it about Jack?"

"He's lost," put in Miss Tabitha; "his ship burnt at sea; the pilot got here this mornin'."

Janet crossed the room and sat down on the doorstep. The same familiar sights and sounds; the same old life, and Jack gone.

A dull aching pain filled her heart, a pain that nothing in all the after years of her life could ever alleviate.

Miss Pamela came out on her way home. "Good-bye, child," she said kindly; "don't take it to heart, but 'tis awful sudden, I know. How I pity poor Jack's mother! I'd go down and try to comfort her, but they have sent for me at Judge Seaton's. The Davenport's got in from Europe this mornin', an' Tom Seaton's engaged to Lizzie Davenport—the weddin's to come off this winter, they say."

Janet heard the words like one in a dream. Tom Seaton to be married! and for his meaningless flattery she had been false to poor Jack!

Christmas day came, and, according to established custom, farmer Gresham and his wife went to dine with an old uncle; but Janet begged to remain at home.

The great logs mouldered into glowing coals. Presently the old watch dog began to bay in his kennel and a footstep crouched the sleet upon the porch. She took the candle in her hand and opened the door.

A tall figure confronted her, a man dressed in sailor's garb and all bronzed and bearded and changed, but she knew him in an instant.

"Oh, Jack—Jack, are you alive? Has God sent you back to me?"

His strong, claspings arms, his hot kisses on her lips and face answered. She clung to him, sobbing like a child. He drew her into the room and up to the glowing fire.

"My beautiful darling," he cried, gazing down enraptured into her sweet face, "and you do love me, you are my own?"

"Your own forevermore, please God," she answered solemnly.

Then, sitting beside him in the firelight, she heard the story of his miraculous escape from death, and in turn told the story of her own folly and unfaithfulness. But he only clasped her all the closer as he listened.

And when the spring came and the bluebirds sang, the contents of the camphor-wood box were brought to light, and the sheeny silk was fashioned into a bridal robe, and with the lustrous pearls amid her gold-brown braids, Janet looked the loveliest bride that ever the sun shone on.

Book Chat.

Did you ever know a man who wrote a shockingly bad hand who didn't seem to be a little proud of it?

Tennyson is said to make $30,000 out of his poetry. He makes dollars out of it when others can't make sense.

"What are you studying?" "Metaphysics." "And what is that?" "I don't know any better than you. I only study it for pleasure."

Mme. Paul Blouet, the wife of the well known writer and lecturer, Max O'Reil, will accompany her husband on his next lecturing tour, which will be through Australia, and which will commence in September next.

Poet (to his practical friend)—"Is there anything more beautiful than to see those magnificent swans float upon the lake's silver surface? How I would love to be like them!" "What! Go around with one's stomach on that cold water all the day! Not for me, thank you."

Says the Boston Record: "If anything could be more snobbish and supercilious than Howell's literary critiques in Harper's Monthly it is a batch of those criticisms bound up together in a small volume. After a man has read far enough to hear Thackeray called theatrical, and Zola praised at the expense of Scott and Dickens, he is ready to curse himself for paying money for such namby-pamby fin de siecle rubbish!" And Mr. Howell is a formerly-of-Boston man, too! But perhaps the "formerly" accounts for it.

Reading novels at midnight by the light of the moon, says the Chicago Tribune, is not known of in the United States, but according to the English wife of Sig. Gregorio Revuelto of Guatemala it is no uncommon thing to see a senorita reclining in a hammock with a book in her hand, on her father's veranda in the Costa Cuca District, Guatemala, between 12 and 1 o'clock in the morning. Sig. Revuelto is a wealthy coffee planter, and is in this country, accompanied by his wife and sister-in-law, on a pleasure trip. The travelers reached Chicago recently, and registered at the Grand Pacific Hotel. "There are no moonlight nights in this country or in England like we have in Guatemala," said the Spanish planter's wife yesterday. "The moon at certain periods of the month is so bright that it is as light out-doors as during the day. English and American poets write about the sublime August moon, etc. They should see a moon in Guatemala during the time it is full. They would then have something to go into ecstasies about. It is too hot during the day in Costa Cuca to be out for pleasure, and all our little excursions around the country are arranged to take place at night when the moon is bright. For instance, when a few friends desire to take a horseback ride around the country the pleasure is never arranged to take place during the daytime. The night is always selected, and the moon furnishes the light. Picnics, boat rides and all pleasure excursions take place when it is known the moon will furnish the light. I do not exaggerate when I say that it is no uncommon thing to see a young woman reading a novel early in the morning by moonlight." Sig. Revuelto does not speak much English, but could speak enough yesterday to inform all callers that the coffee crop this year will be an immense one in Guatemala, and the cost of the article certainly ought to be cheaper this fall.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

If it were necessary Mayor Shakespeare could get Ignatius Donnelly to prove an alibi for him.

They are so strict in a certain Connecticut town that the authorities will not allow a public fountain to play on Sundays.

The artist's requirements are more exacting than the actor's; to attain success, he has to do something more than "draw a good house."

Annie Louise Carey, at one time considered among the greatest of contraltos, is a large blonde woman in whose handsome countenance beams the benevolence of her heart. Domestic affairs and charity work now engage the greater share of her daily time and attention.

John A. Lane and Ben. Rogers will join the dramatic forces of Mojeska next season. Mr. Rogers, who is a sterling old actor, was for the past sixteen years connected with Edwin Booth. Mme. Mojeska, in addition to her repertory, which is already very extensive, will produce a new play called "Magic Mask."

Margaret Mather proposes to revive the tragedy of "Medea" next season, which has been rewritten for her. It will be given as a double bill with a new light comedy. Her repertory will also include "Romeo and Juliet," "Leah," "As You Like It," "The Lady of Lyons," "The Honeymoon," and "Joan d' Arc."

The new semi-religious and historical play which Thomas W. Keene intends adding to his repertory next season is nearly completed. It will appeal, it is claimed, to a class of patronage that now but rarely go to the theatre, while at the same time it is intended to interest the better class of theatre-goers everywhere.

Who was it that first applied to Boston the sobriquet of the Athens of America or the Modern Athens? Was it Edmund Kean, the actor? In a volume written by an Englishman forty years ago we find Kean credited with that performance, and we are wondering whether Boston owes that pet name to no more distinguished an origin.

"When I was in the show business," said a retired showman, "the most drawing card we could devise was just to board up an empty cage and put it near the entrance where people on the outside could see it. Crowds of curious people would gather about it, and all sorts of wild speculations would be indulged in as to what it contained. There's no card like a 'curiosity arouser.'"

Playwriter (to his friend): "So meditative, old fellow; whose thoughts are you busy with now?" Uncle Wayback (at Metropolitan concert)—"I can't make head or tail out of that tune the fiddlers is playin'. City Niece (whispering)—"It's a symphony." "It don't seem funny a bit. Who wrote it?" "Beethoven." "Who's he?" "A great German composer, uncle." "Oh! no wonder I can't understand it. But considering the price they charge for tickets, I think they might play it in English."

At church, the theatre, and other assemblies the Japanese take off their shoes. "At the large theatre in Trukiji, Tokio," says a correspondent, "the rush for shoes is sometimes tremendous. Imagine 2,000 people after a matinee crowding and elbowing and pushing to get at their shoes, so as not to be late for their supper! Further, imagine what anxieties and distress of mind the attendants must undergo who have in charge the task of getting the multitude properly shod. The famous problem propounded by Carlyle in the opening chapter of 'Past and Present' of 'getting the thousands of shirts on the thousands of backs' doesn't offer more difficulties."

Probably the most romantic villain of history is Richard III. Nobody wishes to lose him. He gives artistic verisimilitude to the age in which he lived; and yet there now comes an apologist who would strip him of his gloomy scowl, of his impish mockery and fiendish cruelty, and make him to be "a marvelous proper man." In the latest number of the English Historical Review, Mr. Clements Markham, a very interesting essayist, takes up the cudgels on behalf of Richard, and argues that, instead of having been the arch-villain that history has painted him, he was a perfect model of uprightness, gentleness and propriety. Archbishop Morton was, it appears, the author of that account of Richard which was attributed to Sir Thomas More; and Mr. Markham blames Richard for not having served that ecclesiastic as he did Lord Hastings, instead of permitting him to circulate such vile and atrocious libels on a man who was "too childish-foolish for this world." But what is likely to create the greatest surprise is the assertion that the real murderer of the young princes in the tower was no less a person than Richmond, afterward Henry VII. He, not Richard, instigated the death of these innocents; and his wretched after-life and premature decease show that he suffered the torturing pangs of remorse.

Professional Chat.

The steel pen is mightier than the boxing-glove. And when Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes asserts that he likes to see a good sparring match he knows that he can spar with the dictionary of President's English as well as any other man living. The autocrat of the breakfast table can also handle objectionable characters without gloves if need be.

We now have the information that very few of the many girls who are studying law ever expect to practice the profession at the bar. Many of the students are typewriters in law offices, and they expect simply to gain sufficient knowledge of Blackstone to make their services more valuable in that capacity. Typewriting and law will be a very happy combination.

An Austin lawyer caught a tramp in his office stealing some law books, which the latter intended to pawn. Seizing the intruder by the collar, the lawyer exclaimed: "You scoundrel, I'll have you tried and sent to the penitentiary." "Let go my neck, Colonel. If you are going to have me tried, I reckon I'd better engage you as my lawyer, as you have the luck to be on hand," replied the tramp.

James Whitcomb Riley, having been asked what he did to warm up an irresponsible audience when he was lecturing, answered: "I do not try. You know I am near-sighted, and without my glasses I'm not worth a straw. Well, when I see I have a cold and critical audience, I just take off my glasses and lay them on the desk. Then the house can be just as uneasy as it likes, for I can't see a thing. The whole house might get up and leave and I'd never know it. It doesn't pay for an audience of mine to be cold, for I let them do all the freezing."

From the Omaha Bee we get the following: In a trial in the United States Court where a young man had been indicted for passing a counterfeit $10 bill, the counsel of the latter, C. A. Baldwin, Esq., objected to Gen. Strickland's course in endeavoring to prove by business men the fact that the bill in question was a counterfeit, but to no purpose. Finally, improving a favorable chance, Mr. Baldwin substituted a good bill for the counterfeit, which genuine money Gen. Strickland then proved by three business men to be the rankest kind of counterfeit. Thereupon Mr. Baldwin vehemently demanded that attention be given to his objections and Judge Dundy insisted that the District Attorney send out for a bank cashier and an expert. With great confidence Gen. Strickland handed to the expert the bill—after establishing his business and his experience in handling money—and said: "State to the jury whether, in your opinion, that bill is good or bad?" "This is a good bill, sir," returned the witness. "What!" shouted the attorney, "do you mean to say that bill is not a counterfeit?" "Yes, sir; if you will bring it down to the Omaha National Bank we will give you the gold for it." Then there was a scene, in the midst of which Mr. Baldwin managed to explain to the Court that he had changed bills without the knowledge of the District Attorney, and that in view of the fact that three good business men had testified that a genuine bill was a counterfeit, he thought considerable allowance should be made for his client—an ignorant country boy—in mistaking a counterfeit for a good bill. The jury were evidently impressed with the idea, for they rendered a verdict of acquittal.

The following tough story is related by a writer for a daily paper: "Foxcroft Cole and J. Appleton Brown, two of Boston's most prominent landscape painters, were in a dime museum in that city one day and among the freaks was an artist with flowing chestnut locks that fell in ripples over his shoulders. He was attired in the traditional velvet jacket, and in an unassuming voice that could not have been heard more than a block away he announced to the multitude that he could teach the most thick-headed person to paint a landscape in twelve minutes for 50 cents. Mr. Brown and Mr. Cole, never having had the agility to achieve such a piece of artistic gymnastics during their careers, thought that there was money in the scheme, so they paid their 50 cents each and asked, to be enlightened. After having learned the proper color to paint foregrounds, still water and autumn leaves in the approved Hudson-river school style, they called time and started. At the eleventh minute fifteen second Mr. Brown had finished a beautiful symphony in green and apple blossoms, Mr. Cole coming in on the twelfth minute eighth second with an autumn landscape of a brilliancy that would have made Monet green with envy. The museum artist looked on approvingly, and, patting them on the back with a generosity of feeling that characterizes a great genius, remarked that it was almost as good as he did himself when he began. At this praise both artists bowed in awed reverence before the great man and asked permission to paint each other's portraits on the spot to see what they could do without tuition. The result was two stirring sketches of their respective heads, a complete prostration of the velvet-coated genius and an offer of $15 a week from the manager of the museum. They refused."

CALIFORNIA IN 1837.

Interesting Notes by General Bidwell on the Diary of Colonel Philip L. Edwards—A Contribution to Our Early History.

Last year there was published in THEMIS the diary of the late Colonel Philip L. Edwards, by authority of the Board of Directors of the State Library. The original manuscript is the property of the State, and is an account of a trip made by Col. Edwards and a small party to California, in 1837. Later, our articles were issued in book form by the State. General John Bidwell, of Chico, one of the earliest American settlers in the State, was sent a copy of the diary by an editor of this journal, and concerning it the General writes:

I scarcely can find words sufficient to thank you for the diary of Col. Edwards. It brings to me a return of early scenes almost as vivid as a photograph, and must be most interesting at least to those who know how to interpret and appreciate it. * * * Some of the cattle lost by Capt. Young [who accompanied Col. Edwards—Eds.] in 1837 were occasionally seen even after 1841. Cow Creek, in Shasta county, took its name from a cow found there before any grants of land or settlements were made in the Upper Sacramento.

The only published work we have been able to find referring to this early visit of Edwards is "The Exploring Expedition to Oregon," written by Rev. Gustavus Hines, printed in 1850. Upon its authority, in 1832, four Flathead Indians, living west of the Rocky Mountains, journeyed on foot to St. Louis, for the purpose of inquiring for the Christian Bible and the white man's God. Early in 1833 this fact was published in a religious paper in New York, and the Methodist Church authorities determined to establish a mission among the Indians. Rev. Jason Lee was chosen superintendent of the proposed mission in June, 1833, and in August following his nephew, Rev. Daniel Lee, was appointed to assist him. They knew of no way of reaching the field of their labors by land or sea, until November, when a notice was published that Capt. N. J. Wyeth, who had returned overland from Oregon, contemplated to recross the continent in the Spring. The Lees obtained permission to accompany that party. Early in March, 1834, they left New England for the West, "and on arriving in Missouri, P. L. Edwards, also a lay member, was connected with the mission party, which now numbered four." Cyrus Shepard was the fourth member. On April 24, 1834, they met Capt. Wyeth and his party at Fort Independence, Missouri, and the next day commenced their wearisome journey across the plains.

After a journey of 152 days they arrived at Fort Vancouver, and for the first night in that interval were enabled to sleep under a roof. Later on, the site of the mission was decided upon "after much prayer for direction as to the place," in the Willamette Valley, seventy-five miles from the sea coast. A vessel called the May Dacre brought out the goods for the mission around Cape Horn, and she arrived in Oregon in October. Houses were constructed, and it would appear that considerable hardships were suffered by the pioneer missionaries. They, however, went to work with assiduity. The soil was tilled, the Indians converted, educated and taught to labor. In September, 1835, Edwards left the mission to embark on board the May Dacre for the United States, but he relinquished his idea of leaving the country, and returning to the mission in October, established a school at Campment du Sable. In February, 1836, it being rumored that there was in contemplation by certain Americans the establishment of a distillery, the missionaries effected the organization of the first temperance society formed on the Pacific coast. It consisted of eighteen members. It seems the parties who contemplated the establishment of the distillery were Young and Carmichael. On January 2, 1837, a meeting was held of the Oregon Temperance Society, and resolutions were passed requesting the parties to forever abandon their enterprise, and agreeing to reimburse them for their outlay to that date. Col. Edwards was one of four who promised in writing to advance the money. Young and Carmichael sent back a communication announcing their determination to abandon the enterprise, and declined to accept the tendered recompense.

In the year 1837 a disagreement arose between the Hudson Bay Company and the settlers, concerning cattle, and the latter formed the California Cattle Company, the object of which was to purchase cattle in California and drive them into Oregon. Col. Edwards and Ewing Young were chosen managers of the company, and January 19, 1837, was the day appointed for the vessel to sail. The diary of Edwards commences with an entry dated January 14, 1837, and ends abruptly on September 18th. In March, 1838, Edwards and a party returned overland to Missouri.

General Bidwell has returned to us, temporarily, the copy sent him of Colonel Edwards' diary, and upon the margins of the pages he has made annotations that add to the historical interest of the original manuscript. From a resume of the annotations the General states that he became acquainted with Colonel Edwards in this city in 1850-51; that the law partner of Edwards was B. F. Farr, who afterward became the attorney and most intimate friend of General Bidwell. By referring to the first directory published in Sacramento city we find Farr registered as a lawyer, and officing at 102 J street. Concerning the numbers of the party who left Oregon with Colonel Edwards in January, 1837, General Bidwell writes: "None of these names are familiar, except that of Young; never saw him, but he was often mentioned in the early forties in connection with events in Oregon." From our investigations, if we have located the right person, Young died in Oregon many years ago. General Bidwell notes that he knew the Mr. Birnie, or his son, spoken of by Edwards. Birnie was an agent of a fur company.

Speaking of the Russian establishments in Sonoma county, the General says: "The Russians, in possession of Fort Ross, Bodega, and intervening coast, sold to Sutter in 1841, including all personal property. I had charge during 1841, and until the spring of 1842." Of Captain Cooper's mill in Sonoma county, he says: "Captain John Cooper, I knew him well; this was the first saw-mill ever erected in California, but was never used, I think. It was on Russian river, several miles from its mouth, at the bend below Healdsburg, where the river turns west." Speaking of the late General Vallejo, General Bidwell notes that he knew him and his family well, and that "he was Comandante General (Commander-in-Chief of the military) during the administration of Governor Juan Bautista Alvarado." Jacob P. Leese built the first frame house in San Francisco, and was a brother-in-law of General Vallejo. Of Dr. John Marsh, Bidwell says: "I knew him well; he lived near the present town of Antioch." We may add, that Marsh was one of the earliest American settlers in this country, that he was a man of much more than ordinary education; that his writings in the way of correspondence to leading eastern newspapers did much to attract attention to the then undeveloped resources of California. His life was a romance; his death tragical. In September, 1856, while driving to his magnificent rancho he was waylaid by three Mexicans and brutally murdered. They escaped, and it was not until 1867 that judicial punishment was visited upon them. Of John Reed, General Bidwell notes: "His ranch was called San Clemente, and located at or near the base of Mount Tamalpais."

Edwards notes that at Santa Cruz his party met David Spence. Concerning Spence, General Bidwell says: "He was a Scotchman, and a very intelligent and reputable man." Of Job F. Dye, the General states that he was the original grantee of the Dye ranch, near Red Bluff, now owned by J. S. Conc. Dye arrived in this country February 14, 1832, and died March 4, 1883. Of Wm. Gulnac the General writes: "Knew him well; he lived at the Pueblo de San Jose, and was the original grantee of the ranch on which the city of Stockton is now located." On August 14th, Colonel Edwards records that they reached the Jesus Maria (Bonaventura). In explanation General Bidwell notes: "American, river called originally by the Mexicans Jesus Maria, or Santa Maria, or possibly (Bonaventura) at Sacramento." In the diary of Colonel Edwards there is a spelling "Chastas." General Bidwell notes: "I first wrote it Shasta, as nearest the Indian pronunciation. Fremont spelled the name Tshastl, I think." There are other annotations made by General Bidwell that are of interest. It is gratifying that one so well informed as he is should take the pains he has to perpetuate the early history of this State and coast.

Speculative philosophy, like a "speculative" business, affords more blanks than prizes, and abounds in risks, but not in satisfactory results.

Many a man, a philosophical writer says, is rich without money. Thousands of men with nothing in their pockets, and thousands without even a pocket, are rich. A man born with a good, sound constitution, a good heart, limbs, and a pretty good head-piece, is rich. Good bones are better than gold, tough muscle than silver, and nerves that flash fire and carry energy to every function, are better than houses and lands. It is better than a landed estate to have the right kind of a father and mother.

It is natural to speak of lovely woman as "stooping" to folly as from a superior height, even if the male critic takes refuge in the epigram that "woman's at best a contradiction still." Nay, even if we agree with that couplet of Tuke's play so much liked by Charles II:

"He is a fool who thinks by force or skill
To turn the current of a woman's will"— we must, nevertheless, admit that in the history of the world there has been nothing quite so potent.

Many of the uninformed people who are clamoring for reform in everything have little idea of what constitutes equal rights. There are so-called working-men and farmers that have an idea that they have a constitutional right to take what belongs to another without compensation. Thousands follow the lead of demagogues under the idea that they are, by some inevitable process, to get something for nothing. Indeed, the tenets of all these radical schemes seem to be: "How can we obtain the greatest amount of money for giving the very least consideration?"

A gentleman who is voluntarily residing in Boston, and who is described as "an excellent philologist and a lover of elegant speech," expresses horror at the use of the word "hello" as a telephonic salutation. "Hello," he thinks, is a vulgarism and a corruption, and should be eschewed. Perhaps it will not be encroaching too much upon his time to ask this gentleman to prepare a select assortment of Greek epigrams, Shakespearean soliloquies and poetic quotations for use in telephonic conversations. Business men in a hurry would be sure to observe any little delicacy like that, for instance, of being greeted with a theorem from Euclid or an Æschylean couplet.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

June 12th and 13th Gunter's popular drama Mr. Barnes of New York will be given at the Metropolitan. There has been a change in the caste since the last production in this city. We think it would be difficult to supply the place of Emily Rigl as "Marina Paoli." This is one of the strongest plays on the stage. The plot is always alive, and there is no want of incident or sensation throughout.

Last Monday and Tuesday nights The Fakir combination played to empty seats. Artists can generally supply the deficiency of plot, but there was a plentiful lack of artists on this occasion. It was announced in the house programmes that "The plot obscures the stage." This must have referred to the stage curtain which granted a relief even to the meager audience by obscuring plot, company, and all. There was not tact enough in this company to discard venerable variety songs and business taken from other farce comedies. It is difficult to understand why experienced managers allow such travesties to drift out in the theatrical world. This is a case of alleged farce comedy run mad. The foolkiller should come from under cover when next such a combination is started on the road.

Ancient Native Sons.

There is a general impression that the Native Sons are generally young men, upon whom age has made no marked ravages. Particularly has this impression prevailed since the death of General Vallejo, the oldest Native Son. An incident occurred a few years ago, however, that convinced the State Board of Agriculture there were some antique specimens among California's sons. A committee of the natives was appointed to wait on the Board to secure some concessions for one of the periodical outbursts of the Parlors. The committee consisted of General H. I. Willey, County Auditor Frank T. Johnson and J. O. Funston. Willey and Johnson are about as bald as men are made; and while in some respects a bald head is an inconvenience, particularly in fly-time, in the cases of these gentlemen it gives them a reflective look, and impresses one with a feeling that the loss of the hair is but an unmasking of wisdom. Funston's baldness is eccentric. It does not involve the entire upper hemisphere of the head, but is much after the style affected by young ministers. It is perceptible, and yet not so. It can be seen that the hair on the extreme north of the head is thin and short, but in commendation of it there is not exposed an extensive area of shining scalp. At the time the committee waited on the board, Judge Shafter was in the chair. The petitioners were heard with patience, when the Judge looked over his spectacles and facetiously said: "Native Sons! What, such a delegation of bald-headed old men come here and tell me they are native sons of a State so young as this; it really makes me feel old." The "boys," however, had their request granted, but it is noticeable since the Parlors have taken away committee duty from their bald-headed members.

Sad Bereavement.

We note, regretfully, the death of Louis B. Mohr, Jr., that occurred here on the 1st. Mr. Mohr was but 20 years of age, and had been married but a few months. It would seem the visitations of the Angel of Death, in some cases, are unjustly severe. A few years ago Richard, an older brother, and a young man of exceptionally bright promise, was stricken down, leaving a wife and young child. Mrs. Brune, a daughter of Mr. Mohr, died recently while traveling in Europe. Mr. Mohr and his family have the sympathy of their very many friends.

LIFE IN NEW YORK CITY.

THE INTERESTING CASE OF PASQUALINA ROBERTIELLO

How Cemeteries May be Transformed into Gold Mines—The Squabbles of the Ministers—Photomania and its Victims.

[Special Correspondence of THEMIS.]

NEW YORK, May 29th.

Truly pitiful appeared the case of little Pasqualina Robertello, the young and pretty Italian girl who was on trial during the first part of the week for the murder of her false lover, Nicolo Pierro. A great deal of sympathy was felt all through the trial for the petite little body who handled her pistol so effectively. That Pierre was an unmitigated scoundrel no one has ever doubted. Pasqualina loved her paramour not wisely but too well, and it was only when she was about to become a mother that she importuned the unprincipled Nicolo to accompany her to the house of a priest where they would be married, and then live happily together as man and wife. From time to time she was put off with meager promises. Finally a day was fixed upon for the marriage ceremony, but Nicolo once more broke his promise. Pasqualina again pleaded that a time be named, and to quiet her importunities Pierro mentioned another definite date, all the while determined to avoid the little woman who still had faith in him. Time rolled on and Pierro studiously kept out of sight. He persistently avoided his former sweetheart, who by this time had begun to grow desperate. The warm Italian blood in her veins surged wildly when she thought of her faithless lover. Finally the two met, and to Pasqualina's repeated pleadings Pierro roughly told her to "go on the street" and make her livelihood there. As for him, he would start for Italy immediately. He had had enough of her, and did not want to be bothered by her again. This cruel treatment was too much for Pasqualina's patience, and she killed her betrayer at their next meeting. Describing her sensations at the moment the tragedy was being enacted, Pasqualina told the jury how, just before the fatal shot was fired, her eyesight seemed to fail her. "I saw everything black," she said. "My head was going round. When I was taken home by the police I did not know what I had done." The scene as rehearsed in open Court was a truly dramatic one, and not a few eyes were moist when the child told her simple story. All this had a greater effect upon the jury than the lofty eloquence or fine logic of the lawyers. It was not surprising, therefore, when the jury brought in a verdict of "not guilty," and the poor little prisoner fell on her mother's bosom in a swoon of joy. The great cheer that went up from the spectators when the words "not guilty" rung out full and clear, has been seldom if ever before equalled in a New York Court of justice. The interesting case of little Pasqualina Robertello only further proves the growing popular dislike for the infliction of capital punishment, especially when the law is to visit its vengeance upon a woman.

An experienced dentist, who is also something of a statistician, said to me yesterday: "At the risk of being called a monumental liar, I am ready to assert and prove by the facts in my possession that more than fifteen hundred pounds of pure gold is inserted every year in the teeth of American citizens. Of course this gold is never recovered, but goes down into the grave with the men and women in whose mouths the precious metal is placed. With proper allowance for the rapid increasing of the country's population, and the fact that American teeth are steadily deteriorating in soundness, it is clear that in the course of a hundred years or so the cemeteries of the United States will contain more gold than is now to be found in the vaults of the treasury at Washington." The assertions of my tooth-pulling friend are not so fanciful as they would at first blush seem. Though the value of the gold filling set in American teeth, according to my informant's statistics, is equivalent to about four hundred thousand of Uncle Sam's hard round silver dollars, it will not appear enormous to those whose defective molars force upon them the necessity of frequent and painful interviews with their dental advisers. The pocket books of such unfortunates will attest the truth of my statistical tooth doctor's figures.

For a whole fortnight theatre-goers have discussed but one subject—Richard Mansfield's new play of Don Juan. So that there might be no misunderstanding as to whom rightly belonged the honors of the playwright in this instance, Mr. Mansfield tabooed all ideas of collaboration with any one else, and set himself to work to evolve an original play from his inner consciousness and rich experience. The result of his lonely labors is the much talked of Don Juan. That Mr. Mansfield has made a grave mistake in picking a foolish quarrel with his former collaborator on the question of the real authorship of Beau Brummel, was manifestly shown at the first performance of Don Juan. The clever touches in the dialogue of the former play which make it fairly scintillate with sparkling wit and humor, are conspicuously absent in the latest addition to Mr. Mansfield's unusual repertory. I do not mean by this to imply that Don Juan was a failure because Clyde Fitch had no hand in its making, but rather that it was not a great success because the combined genius of the finished playwright and the finished actor was not brought to bear upon its construction. That Clyde Fitch could not write a great play alone was easily proven by himself in his recent sketchy and entirely uninteresting drama Frederic Lemaire, which failed to make the hit that its author had confidently expected it would. The case of Mansfield and Don Juan is a parallel one. For more reasons than one the latter play is open to serious criticism. Its greatest fault lies in its unevenness of construction. Then, too, there is a lack of probability about the whole thing which detracts from its interest. There is no coherency of events in the play; a fact especially noticeable in the final act where the brilliantly clever comedy is suddenly plunged into a veritable chaos of wild and stormy melodrama. The act is not a pleasant one, or one likely to be remembered. It comes upon the spectator with cruel suddenness and shocks the sensibilities into numbness. In spite of its many glaring faults, however, Don Juan seems destined to have a long run. Unquestionably it takes rank among the notable dramatic events of an unusually productive season. There is one thing which Richard Mansfield seems to understand very thoroughly, and that is the art of making himself the subject of much popular discussion. He is a shrewd but delicate self-advertiser. But when all has been said, Mansfield remains one of the most interesting figures on the New York stage to-day.

No one who has taken a hand in the lively discussions which have been agitating the world of religion of late has put the situation with greater succinctness or force of logic than did the Rev. Dr. Parkhurst of the Madison Square Presbyterian Church of this city in his stirring sermon of last Sunday. Speaking of the case of Dr. Briggs, and his alleged heresies, Dr. Parkhurst said: "To tie us to the sixteenth century, is an attempt to drive the Presbyterian buggy with a hitched horse." The facts advanced in recent ministerial trials would seem to indicate that the most advanced theologians are at least three centuries behind the times, and can therefore never be in harmony with the ideas advanced by the more progressive teachers of right living and right thinking. To the purely secular mind the squabbling over mere matters of creed which is now going on in the camps of the Christian teachers is intensely amusing. How the controversy will end, if it end at all, I for one do not care to consider. The situation, as it now stands, is at all events a highly interesting one, and seems to hinge upon the belief of certain factions of religionists who think that the world has moved forward during the past three centuries, and those who think it has not.

The season is now ripe for the advent of the amateur photographer. He is already a much too numerous person in the metropolis, but he will assuredly increase in number as the days roll on. Once in a while the wanderer in a side street will run afoul of a tall, pale-complexioned youth, with a bravely struggling mustache and an absorbed expression of countenance, who has just posed the members of his family (to say nothing of the neighbors' children) on the steps of the front stoop, and is busily engaged in taking a snap-shot of the group. That's him in his first stage of evolution. There's no mistaking the amateur photographer. Soon he will pick up his lilliputian camera-box and flimsy tripod and start out on his annual rampage in the country. Just at present, however, he infests city and suburbs alike. There is no retreat so secure, be it urban or rural, that is proof against the incursions of the photomaniacs. Your photographic enthusiast is a person before whom you should go down on your knees with fear and trembling. Of personal rights he knows nothing and cares less; of public property ditto, only more so. He will "take" anything that can be brought within the focus of his dreadful machine. He will steal your wife's pretty face and figure and your own carelessly posed person, and you may never perhaps be conscious of the theft. When strongly smitten with the fascinations of his awful hobby, his energy is boundless; his audacity sublime. There comes a dull, hot day, and you go down into the country and quickly repair to a quiet piece of woodland, where you know there is a crystal pool, and you plunge in and disport yourself playfully for an hour or so, and then come forth invigorated, happy and refreshed—and you won't discover until next fall that the camera fiend was in the woods before you, and that from his retreat behind the shrubbery he aimed his deadly picture-gun at your inoffensive person and secured for posterity a "full-length view" of your unadorned anatomy. There are other unfortunate happenings which make you a victim of the amateur photographer. Perhaps you fall into a doze and an ungraceful position at the same time; you are by an open window and within easy range of a Kodak—snap! he has got you, open mouth and all. Does it please your fancy to take an aimless stroll through the park accompanied by your sweetest Sunday smile and your best girl! the demon incarnate is on hand. But you don't know it, and so perhaps you are a trifle careless in your deportment. You may be a very poor young man, but it's greenbacks against gooseberries that you would cheerfully give a week's salary to have known that you were going to be put on record in an unmistakable way when you allowed your right arm to steal around the waist of your fair companion. There is seemingly no use of railing against this crying evil of our times. The law has decreed certain things against the indiscriminate criminalities of the amateur photographer, but the law is helpless in this as in many other matters. From New Zealand to the North Pole, from Gotham to the Golden Gate, from Dan to Beersheba—go where you will, you cannot escape the ubiquitous nuisance. He is everywhere at all times; his only baggage is his diminutive trunk, with its wicked, winking eye. You can jump from a tower, climb a flag-pole, dive into the ocean, board a passing street-car or fall into a coal-pit, and your most ambitious activity will never be too agile for the all-seeing vision of the little black box with a button. When you least expect it you are neatly impaled and you writhe in agony, but the only redress for the wrongs you suffer at the hands of the amateur photographer is to buy a cheap outfit yourself and photograph him and his unworthy actions (out of focus), and then send the finished picture to an exhibition of amateur work, labeled "Study of a Mule."

Matrimonial.

Thomas W. Humphrey, a member of the Sacramento bar, and well known throughout the county, and Edith C. Smith were married at Folsom on the 31st inst. We extend to the young couple our congratulations. Mr. Humphrey, though a young practitioner comparatively, has built up an enviable practice, due in large measure that he attends strictly and promptly to business placed in his hands. While Mr. Humphrey finds it more advantageous to conduct his law office without a partner, he has wisely determined that rule will not prevail in domestic matters.

Apple Blossoms.

Only the day before we left the Rapidan, the apple trees had come out in full bloom, and it was a sight to soften a soldier's heart to behold them clothed in robes of peace and purity. Every breath of wind brought the odor of the blossoms to our nostrils, and it was something to take us back home to the old apple tree growing beside the well-curb at the kitchen door.

The enemy had fallen back before our advance until they got the shelter of a forest-crowned ridge with a creek meandering along its front. At the first gun from them our battery wheeled to the left, rushed for the high ground covered by a farm-house orchard, and as we unlimbered and began firing long-fuse shell I discovered that the limbs of a grand old apple tree spread out over our heads until every man was sheltered. How pure and delicate those blossoms looked! How refreshing the odor exhaled! The powder smoke blew back among them, but they seemed to shake it off, and, though our faces were soon begrimed, the odor of those white blossoms was still in our nostrils!

Like the soft, lazy snowflake of a Spring day, the blossoms came floating down among us, detached from the limbs by the concussion. I even brushed them off the gun as I sighted it to send a shell with murderous intent. Some one said the enemy was advancing. I brushed the falling blossoms right and left to enable me to see. Some one said that one of our men had been killed just behind me. The blossoms pelted my cheek as I turned to look.

Well, it was over in half an hour, with less than a hundred killed and wounded. We sponged out our gun, limbered up, and then I turned to the poor fellow who would never answer roll-call again. He had already been buried. The ground about us was as white as if snow had fallen, and ten feet away lay our dead comrade—shrouded in the white apple blossoms—buried under the beautiful and delicate petals which the crash of war had shaken down! Wasn't it a glorious shroud and a peaceful grave for a warrior? A bullet fired by a sharpshooter who had crept up a ravine had entered his heart, and he had fallen on his back and lay with eyes open wide and the blood welling out of his death wound. And the blossoms had hidden his eyes and their awful stare—had veiled his face until we could not see its pallor—had fallen so thickly upon his broad breast that there was no trace of the bullet and its work!

It was the soft, tender hands of Nature seeking for the moment to hide the murderous work of war—to soften the hearts of men armed with every device to slay their fellow-men. And the soft breeze carried the smoke away behind the farm-house, to be lost over the meadows, and in its place came again the odor of blossoms and the songs of red-breasted robins. Blossoms fell upon the dead as they were laid in the shallow trenches to sleep forever more, and above them the robins called to each other and returned to their deserted nests.—N. Y. World.

An Unenjoyable Ride.

A young gentleman had an engagement with the daughter of a prosperous citizen to attend theater. The young lady suggested that they use the family carriage, and the gallant was too polite to decline. On the morning of the engagement the young lady asked her father to please to stop in Mr. Bowersox's office and inquire where he wanted the carriage to call for him. The kindly old gentleman did so. He stepped in the office and, calling to the young man, said:

"I want to see about that carriage."
"Wait a moment," said the youth, evidently agitated. He laid down his pen and, coming from behind the desk, led his visitor into a dark corner and continued: "I can't settle that right now, as I am decidedly hard up. I'll fix it by the middle of the month, dead sure."

"What do you mean?" said the old gentleman.

"Why, ain't you the collector for the Gougeon Transfer Company?"

"No; I'm not. I'm Miss Bondholder's father, and I want to know where my carriage is to be sent for you to-night."

He went to the theater in the carriage, but he did not enjoy it much.

The Most Destructive Epidemic.

The most appalling epidemic that ever desolated the world was the terrible black death, or the great pestilence, as it was called, which appeared in the fourteenth century. There are no proper materials for estimating the mortality which this plague produced, as it occurred before the value of statistics was appreciated. But in China, 13,000,000 are said to have died, and in the rest of the East nearly 24,000,000. In Europe the horror was increased by the greater exactness of details. London alone lost over 100,000; fifteen European cities lost among them 300,000; Germany was calculated to have lost 1,250,000 and Italy one-half of its population. On a moderate calculation it may be assumed that there perished in Europe 25,000,000 human beings, while the total mortality from this fearful scourge can hardly have fallen short of 70,000,000 of people.

One of the Fat Man's Miseries.

Perhaps there are a great many people who know a great many things who do not know how a fat man sits down. We lean people, says the Detroit News, who, unless from an æsthetic motive, do not have to make a study of the art of sitting down, cannot appreciate the difficulties a fat man may have in placing himself in a chair. He cannot, as we do, swing himself to any frail seat, turn with an easy motion, and, with a general and graceful collapse, be seated. E. W. Voygt, whose known weight is 313 pounds, was recently carefully watched as he endeavored to seat himself. As he approached the chair he measured it carefully with a trained eye. Then he backed up to it as he would back up to a cart. Looking over his shoulder he saw that his position was geographically correct. Then, with a droll, uncertain expression on his dumpling face, he humped his shoulders and scrooged up the small of his back, thus shortening himself six inches. He placed his hands at his sides a little back of him, and firmly grasped the arms of his chair, and a pleased expression came over that chubby face. He leaned his whole body forward, breaking at the hips, the chair presenting a rear elevation something like the complicated eaves of a house, or the broken section of a cantilever. He braced himself for a mighty effort and began tugging resolutely at the chair. It was like pulling on a tight boot, and this chair was a very close fit indeed. But presently it went on with a snap, and again the clouds cleared from his face. Slowly and carefully he settled back on the floor, pushed himself well back in the heel, and the fat man was in his chair. Getting up is another task for this fat man. He must not arise with thoughtless celerity, for then he will prance about the room with the chair firmly attached, presenting anything but a decorous appearance. He firmly grasps the arms and removes the chair as he would pull off a congress gaiter, and then the fat man is free again.

Origin of Foot-ball.

According to adepts in classical antiquities the game of foot-ball was a favorite one among both the Greeks and the Romans; the former called it "espiskuros" and the latter "harpastum." Some authorities claim that foot-ball is mentioned by Fitz Stephen as an amusement of the English in the reign of Henry II, about 1160. This, however, is doubtful, and depends upon the interpretation of a word, which many people hold to mean tennis. The first undisputed mention of foot-ball occurs in a public edict of the reign of Edward III, 1347, by which foot-ball is prohibited, not, perhaps, from any objection to the game itself, but because it impeded the progress of archery. James II of Scotland also prohibited the game in the year 1457. Sir Thomas Elyot, who wrote in the time of Henry VIII, denounced the game as being "nothyng but beastly fury and extreme violence; whereof procedeth hurte, and consequently rancour and malice do remayn with them that be wounded, whereof it is to be put in perpetual sylence." James I was so impressed with the danger attending this pastime that he wrote in his "Basilicon Doron," "from this court I debarre all rough and violent exercises as the foot ball, meeter for lameing than making able the users thereof." Barclay, in his fifth Eclogue, A. D. 1508, has these lines:

The sturdy plowman, lustie, strong and bold,
Overcometh the winter with driving the foote ball,
Forgetting labour, and many a grievous fall.

The poet Waller also addressed himself to this point in the following lines:

As when a sort of lusty shepherds try
Their force at foot ball, care of victory
Makes them salute so rudely breast to breast
That their encounter seems too rough for jest.

"The Hammer of the Earth."

A correspondent asks, "what city has been called 'the hammer of the earth?'" Babylon receives that appellation in the Bible. You will find the passage in which it occurs in Jeremiah 1:23: "How is the hammer of the whole earth cut asunder and broken? How is Babylon become a desolation among the nations?" Babylon, it has been estimated, must have covered an area equal to five times that of London. Its walls and gates, the great palace of Nebuchadnezzar (the admiration of mankind), the hanging gardens and temple of Bel give some idea of the immense human force at the disposal of its monarch and of how Jeremiah came to use the expression, "the hammer of the whole earth."

Quentin Durward, one of Scott's heroes, is described as an archer in the Scottish guard. He leaves Scotland to seek his fortune in France, a feudal enemy having reduced him to poverty. Unexpected circumstances recommend him to the king's favor, and he becomes a trusted archer in Louis' body guard. Quentin was intrusted with the protection of the women of Croye during a dangerous journey. With courage and presence of mind he extricated them from their perplexities and perils. The Countess Isabelle de Croye and Quentin soon became victims of a romantic passion. After suffering and difficulty they were permitted to marry. Crevecoeur says of Quentin Durward: "It is sense, firmness and gallantry which have put him in possession of wealth, rank and beauty."

The Newest Game Out.

In Brooklyn a short time ago, says the New York Sun, a bright young married woman introduced an abominable game. This game, so far as known, hasn't been christened yet. This is the scheme: Ten virtues, or characteristics, or qualities, are set down in a row, like this:

Honesty,	Affability,
Tact,	Beauty,
Politeness,	Modesty,
Intelligence,	Generosity,
Sobriety,	Consideration.

Then the names of the persons present are set down, and they are taken one at a time and picked to pieces by their friends. The maximum is ten for every virtue, and then the per cent. awarded is added up and the person whose total is nearest 100 is considered the nicest one present.

The appalling brutality of this game can only be appreciated by one who has taken part in it. Imagine yourself in the company of half a dozen girls whose chief characteristic is bluntness, who consider truth the crowning virtue. Suppose you have only recently been introduced to five of the girls, and are not on intimate terms with the men present, and are selected as the first victim of this horrible scheme. The question of your honesty is broached, and every girl instantly bends her brows upon you, and after deliberating for a moment concludes that you are not any too honest, and that 7½ per cent. is all that you are entitled to. This thing recently happened to the writer, and this was the per cent. he got in spite of his own frenzied assertion that he had never swindled a man out of a cent.

Then the merciless young ladies they got down to the same subject's tact, and gave him 6½, while his politeness was estimated at 6½. He got 8 for intelligence, however, which was a comparative pleasure, and then he got 6½ for sobriety and 7 for affability.

Then the trying moment came when the question of his beauty was to be decided. He is sure that he never appeared so ungainly and homely in his life as he did at that moment while sitting with his hands out of sight and his feet as far under the chair as he could get them. There were several whispered conferences and many minute examinations of his person, and then he got only a stingy 5 per cent. This ranked his beauty among the average, and it makes him hot in the collar even now when he thinks of it.

He felt at home, however, when the question of modesty was reached. He didn't care how low he was ranked in this respect, for he always believed that modesty was a stumbling-block in the path of any man. But those terrible girls almost instantly agreed, on the authority of one whom the unfortunate man knows almost well enough to ask for a kiss, that his per cent in this respect was, at least, 8½, or mighty near the maximum. This made the man think, and if the result of this thought doesn't astonish the girl and make her sorry she didn't put the per cent. down to one, why then it'll be a funny thing.

He got 7 for generosity and 8½ for consideration, in spite of his own conviction that these figures should be reversed. His total was 70½, which he was assured was mighty high for a new man.

He got square though by taking an active part in the per cent. of the other members of the company, and the way he insisted that a man he never saw before was a confirmed drunkard, liar and thief made many bitter enemies for him. The horrible game went on until the girls were reached, and then it was a shameful thing to see those down-trodden and abject men vote in chorus for the maximum every time.

The "Grace Card."

The "grace card" is the six of hearts, and the name arose during the English revolution of 1688, when John Grace of Courtstown, Ireland, espoused the cause of King James and raised an armed force on his behalf. William of Orange, knowing what power Grace's high character and reputation would have among the Irish nobility, early solicited him, with splendid promises of royal favor, to join the new party. But on perusing the proposal he instantly seized a card lying near him and returned this indignant answer upon it: "Go tell your master I despise his offer. Tell him that honor and conscience are dearer to a gentleman than all the wealth a prince can bestow." This card happened to be the six of hearts, and to this day it is generally known, in the city of Kilkenny at least, as "Grace's card."

The Loftiest Waterfall.

The loftiest waterfall in the world is to be seen in the Yosemite Valley, Mariposa county. It is formed by the descent of the Yosemite creek down the wall on the north side of the valley, and is divided into three parts. First there is a fall of 1,500 feet, then 626 feet of cascades and finally a plunge of 400 feet to the level of the valley. With a total height of not less than about 2,600 feet this wonderful fall

* * * Rushes from his mountain home All beautiful, but terrible in might. One desperate bound from yonder cloud capped height. Flushing him from his unseen throne, Shot like a flying minister of light. High o'er the chaos wreck his crown is shown Of rainbow glories faded, still upheld alone.

How Col. Ingersoll Got His Start.

In 1859 or 1860, Colonel Ingersoll was a promising young lawyer at Peoria, Ill., fighting hard to secure a practice. He was not very widely known, even in his own locality, at that time, but there were a few who recognized his abilities as a public speaker, and were anxious to give him an opportunity to show what he could do. The opportunity, however, obstinately refused to present itself, but the young attorney kept steadily at work, while his most intimate friend was unable to recognize in him one of the future masters of platform oratory. But his chance finally came in one of the years above mentioned, and in a wholly unexpected way.

The German residents of Peoria concluded to celebrate the Fourth of July, which happened to occur on Sunday that year. The proposition was strongly opposed by the ministers, because they regarded it as a double desecration. So strong became the opposition that the Germans were refused permission to celebrate the day within the corporate limits of Peoria—the mayor expressing his readiness to enforce the prohibitory order. Under such circumstances the Germans were compelled to take to the woods outside the limits in order to give full vent to their patriotism.

The next point was to engage an orator to fill the bill, and after much canvassing and thought over the matter, R. Mueller, then a resident of Peoria, happened to think that young Mr. Ingersoll might do in a pinch. The invitation was extended, he accepted, and his German fellow citizens were happy. Col. Ingersoll delivered his first public oration before a large audience, and it was pronounced a brilliant success, bearing some cutting allusions to what he regarded as the illiberality and narrowness of his ministerial friends.

Of course they replied at the first opportunity, and the young orator was scored rhetorically from head to heels. Mr. Ingersoll replied to the pulpit denunciation of his course, and then the fight began between the cloth and the great agnostic, Pope Bob, which even now shows not the slightest sign of an armistice. The name of the previously unknown young lawyer soon spread beyond the boundaries of Peoria and Illinois.

That Col. Ingersoll appreciates the favor unconsciously rendered him by Mr. Mueller is demonstrated by subsequent events. The latter has been a resident of Minneapolis for several years as agent of the Best Brewing Company, and whenever Col. Ingersoll comes here he invariably notifies his old friend. If there are courtesies to be extended, Mr. Mueller is sure to be one of the fortunates, and Col. Ingersoll's distinguished consideration is too bountiful to be exhausted while the two remain on earth.

Peculiarities of Champagne.

There are two peculiarities about champagne drinking which are capable of explanation. The one is the rapidity with which it exhilarates, notwithstanding the small proportion of alcohol it contains. This is due to the carbonic-acid gas evolved, which is inhaled while drinking, for it is the property of the gas to expedite the action of anything with which it is associated. It is estimated that one glass of champagne is equal in effect to two glasses of still wine of the same strength and is more rapid in action. The other peculiarity is the sort of lethargy or deadness which follows after excessive champagne drinking. This is analogous to the stupor produced by carbonic-acid gas; but it is assisted and intensified by the excess of sugar deranging the stomach. The undigested sugar turns into acid and thus it is that too much champagne is apt to produce dyspepsia. Sweetness is often confused with richness in wines; but, as a matter of fact, sweetness is often produced by the addition of sugar, especially in champagnes. It has been compared to charity, in that it covers a multitude of sins. The richness proceeding from natural saccharine is produced by a natural arrest of the process of fermentation. It occurs mostly in hot climates, but in port making a richness is produced by the artificial arrest of fermentation. As a medicine, however, champagne is best "dry" and its tendency then is to thin the blood.

The Mystery of Second-Growth Forests

Among the curious enigmas of nature which have remained unsolved to the present day is the growth of a forest upon the site once occupied by one which differed in character from the latter growth. Some have supposed that the seeds from which the second forest sprang had been lying undeveloped in the ground for a great length of time, perhaps centuries, but the improbability of seeds retaining their vitality for such a length of time, and under the conditions to which they would necessarily be exposed, makes that theory rather implausible; and, besides, this speculation fails to account for the origin of the seeds necessary to produce the second growth. What reader of "Notes for the Curious" can explain this riddle or tell us why species of weeds and grass wholly different from those found in the surrounding country spring up wherever the earth is turned, even if the point of disturbance be in the center of a grassy plain 500 or 1,000 miles from where such weeds are known to flourish?

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of J. C. Bainbridge, an insolvent debtor. J. C. Bainbridge having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said J. C. Bainbridge is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the county of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal of the said debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the county of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court room of said Court, on the 10th day of June, 1891, at 130 o'clock P. M., of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the county of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. Dated, May 11th, 1891.

W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge of the Superior Court. Wm. A. GETT, JR., Attorney for Petitioner.

Number of Species of Animals.

As nearly every distinguished naturalist has adopted a classification of the animal world differing from all preceding systems, and as each such naturalist has used the word species, but each in a somewhat different sense, it happens that when a novice wishes to learn what the accurate and scientific meaning of the term is he is apt to be puzzled rather than enlightened. However, assuming that species is not the same as genus, that genus means a group of like species, and that species means a group of like individuals supposed to have descended from the same pair of ancestors, then the number of known species of animals amounts to about 155,000, which zoologists have classed as follows:

	Species.
1. Vertebrata—Mammalia, 1,700; birds, 6,000; reptiles, 1,500; fishes, 6,000.....	15,200
2. Mollusca.....	10,000
3. Articulata, including insects.....	120,000
4. Radiata.....	10,000
Total.....	155,200

The ancient Finns believed that a mystic bird laid an egg on the lap of Vainamoinen, who hatched it in his bosom. He let it fall into the water and it broke, the lower portion of the shell forming the earth, the upper the sky; the liquid white became the sun and the yolk the moon, while the little fragments of broken shell were transformed into stars.

ORDINANCE NO. 29.

An Ordinance Regulating Saloons, Dance-houses, Theaters, and Places where Intoxicating Liquors are Disposed of by Retail, and Providing for Licenses Therefor.

The Board of Supervisors of the County of Sacramento do ordain as follows:

Section 1. It shall be unlawful for any person or persons to hereafter open, establish, or conduct, or cause to be opened, established, or conducted, any barroom, public saloon, theater, variety show, dance-house, or other place where wines, spirituous or malt liquors are sold by the glass, bottle, or otherwise, by retail, within the limits of the County of Sacramento, without first obtaining permission from the Board of Supervisors. The application for such permission shall be made by petition in writing to the Board of Supervisors, which petition must contain the names and signatures of a majority of the resident taxpayers in the election precinct, as it at the time exists, in which such saloon or place in which such liquors are to be dispensed is proposed to be opened or conducted.

Sec. 2. If, after due consideration of the same by the Board of Supervisors, the petition be favorably acted upon, it shall be the duty of the person in whose favor the petition was presented, and the prayer of which was granted, before opening the said place to file with the Board of Supervisors a good and sufficient bond, to be approved by the Chairman of the Board, with two sureties in the sum of $1,000, conditioned that the applicant shall maintain said place in a quiet, orderly and decent manner.

Sec. 3. A written verified complaint filed with said Board of Supervisors setting forth that any saloon or place mentioned in Section 1 of this Ordinance is conducted in other than a quiet, orderly, lawful and decent manner shall be foundation for action by the Board of Supervisors concerning the place complained of in said complaint. If after a full investigation of which both sides shall have due notice and the privilege of being represented in person and by counsel and producing and examining witnesses the Board of Supervisors find the allegations of the complaint to be true it shall make an order revoking the license issued to the person owning or conducting the place complained of and shall declare the bond given in such case forfeited.

Sec. 4. On and after July 1st, 1891, persons conducting the business mentioned in Section 1 of this Ordinance and in compliance with the provisions hereof, must pay a license tax to the License Collector of said county in the sum of $30 quarterly in advance; provided, that all licenses in full force at the time of the passage of this Ordinance shall entitle their holders to continue business thereunder until the expiration of the same.

Sec. 5. All parts of Ordinances in so far as they conflict with the provisions of this Ordinance are hereby repealed.

Sec. 6. This Ordinance shall take effect and be in force from and after July 1, 1891.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

There should be added to English literature a carefully prepared work on the subject of "cranks," or "crankles," or possibly "cringles." Webster prepared an extensive vocabulary of our language, but failed to describe what a crank is, as the term is now applied. That Webster did not live in Sacramento may excuse the omission from his famous dictionary. It is the inalienable right of any man to make as great a fool of himself as he desires; it is the right of others who live in the same community, and who do not exhibit themselves, to prayerfully await the coming of what perhaps is mythical, but should be a reality—the foolkiller. Other towns may be similarly afflicted; we are not, however, aware where they are located. Our remarks do not of course apply to but the able thinkers who esteem the general populace need the borrowing of special brains to properly manage their affairs. Years ago we read with interest a series of articles on the subject "The Moral Uses of Dark Things," written by Rev. Horace Bushnell, and published in a religious magazine. The learned writer followed closely the ground work of Dr. Paley's "Evidences of Christianity." It was argued that the destruction of life and property by fire and shipwreck, the depredations of wild beasts, the creation of snakes, sharks and injurious animals and insects, was rather a benefit, but that man had no right to question the wisdom of his Maker, and take issue as to the utility of the creation of rattlesnakes, lions, sharks and locusts, and other destroying and apparently unnecessary agents of destruction. Upon paper, theories are quite plausible. We imagine, however, a man seized by a shark or pursued by a man-eating lion would, if he had time for reflection, fail to see precisely wherein the "moral use of the dark thing" came in. However, gunpowder and knives come in good play to combat the dangers that arise from the lower animals.

The "crank" is, however, more dangerous; the law does not permit he shall be killed; in that regard justice is not justice. He is allowed to give expression to his opinions concerning public matters, and the fact that he is styled a "prominent citizen," and assumes an air of apparent intelligence, is sufficient to open up to him the anonymous column of "Voice of the People" in the daily press, and to make him sought after by the reporters and interviewed upon such important questions as whether the throwing of tin cans into China slough will injuriously affect the cat fish, or whether the street-car companies are furnishing the accommodation they should for the five-cent fare they receive. In this regard we do not blame the "cranks" so much as the newspaper managers. Some men have egotism, and esteem their names in a public journal are in larger and more prominent type than the heading of the paper. It is the experience of every man who has published a paper that in every community there is a sprinkling of persons who will load down the "Public Echo" column, and willingly seek an interview on any subject. We are not particularly concerned in the publication of any journal save THEMIS, but we must say our daily contemporaries should take the measurement of our waste-basket, and provide themselves with similar ones; they are handy, and the best place to file away "Public Echoes;" we find our readers appreciate more that which we do print than that we omit. There are elements of ridiculousness about this thing that it would seem journalists would see in the same light that intelligent readers view them, and a paper worthy to be read should direct its matter to the more intelligent class. Not long since a local journal created much of a stir, and wasted much space and good white paper, upon the matter of the erection of a new hotel in Sacramento. If we remember rightly, the proposition was made to place it on the plaza. It is our recollection the interviews of our prominent citizens favored the plan—they were lengthy, and why that hotel was not built cannot be explained, else it was that a level-headed banker queried: "Where is the money to come from? have you found a man who is willing to undertake this enterprise?" Lately we have had, through interviews with prominent citizens, the surprising information that the division of the Haggin grant would be of benefit to the city; that if it would be cut up it would sustain more families. We assume such would be the result.

Most of the anonymous "public echoes and interviews" are, however, harmless; perhaps beneficial, that they afford work for printers in the setting up in type of valueless matter, but there is a feature about it we must condemn. The policy of this journal has been—and in that regard it has stood alone—to sustain honest and efficient public officers. The abuse that has been heaped upon the police department from some quarters has been shameless, and at times resulted in almost its crippling. We spoke truthfully in a former issue that the Chief of Police of this city has ever been compelled to perform his official duties under the fire of unjust and unreasonable criticism. Looking back, we esteem the people have been fortunate in their selections for that office; there has, however, been no man in that office whose worth has been appreciated. It should be recollected the force is too small; that it has been so efficient is of remark. In San Francisco, Chief Crowley has held the position for over twenty years; he has a skilled corps of detectives and a numerous force of drilled officers. He is an expert, and concerning the recent actions of our little guard he remarked, "I am surprised you do so well, handicapped as you are." There can be no blinding to the fact that Sacramento is now infested with dangerous criminals. The striking of Mr. Allen on the head with a hammer, closely approached murder. No one familiar with the facts can doubt that murder was committed in the cases of Mrs. Spillner and Philip Peyran. That in the latter cases no arrests have been made is simply due to the fact that no clue has been discovered. In the case of Mrs. Spillner, it is manifest to all who heard her dying statement, that she did not tell the truth; her injury was inflicted in the room in which she was found, and not in the hall-way; she certainly knew her assailant; her motive for concealing his identity cannot be surmised, and death has sealed her lips. In the Peyran case, it would seem he was murdered by mistake for Mr. Olsen. He had not gone to bed, for the charred remains showed that he had on his pants and suspenders.

It is no flattering commentary of this city that during the present week we have been called upon to report the proceedings three times in cases where the deaths resulted from criminal violence. It is a fact that, compared with work in civil cases, the shorthand work in this county in matters of crime, is much paramount—in fact, of late the civil business has been insignificant. There is, however, a cause for this state of affairs, but it would seem about wastage of words to again refer to it. Disreputable drinking places should be closed absolutely. In the case of the assault upon Mr. Allen, it did appear in the testimony of Gordon, Brady and McKaig that they frequented Lafayette Hall, that there the plan was discussed as to how Mr. Allen should be "done up." The testimony is on file with the County Clerk, and it would seem the trustees should revoke the license of a place apparently the rendezvous of brutal thugs. We are of the opinion high license will not accomplish the object sought. The places most dangerous can afford to pay the increased tax, and will do so willingly. It must be recollected that while drinking places are of positive detriment, some are conducted that little harm comes from them, others are a menace to life and property—they are, however, few, and a little exhibition of backbone by the trustees would close them up in twenty-four hours. The police power of the municipality is absolute; let it be exercised; the people will sustain their officers.

To speak with reference to men whose worth is not appreciated by the people, we will instance Captain Lee of the police force, and it will be understood we do not in referring to him detract from his superior, the chief. Of Captain Lee we speak, in that he has been made the target of ignorant attack from men who should have enough pride in their intelligence to keep out of print, and not seek out a newspaper as a medium through which to advertise their entire lack of knowledge of matters upon which they assume to advise the public. Lee ranks among men familiar with crime and its detection as an officer equal in ability and judgment to any in the State. Notably was he successful in the cases of Tullis, Scott, Lowell, and Allen. Of the numerous minor cases he has handled we speak not. Yet it has been that prominent citizens have published interviews concerning him that were absolutely absurd. That he has not been removed is not due to the opinions of the "thinkers;" that he would be removed would be a calamity to this people. There is another man who is receiving a considerable share of execration because he is intelligent and progressive—Health Officer C. B. Nichols. It would not surprise us if the "prominent" "thinkers" of the city will march him across the Yolo bridge and order him to leave town. His offense is that he desires to save this people from a pestilence. That we have not had a visitation of contagious disease since the cholera of 1850 is due more to the kindness of Providence than to what we have done for ourselves. We observe the grave members of the Improvement Association condemn the publication of the truth; that it may hurt this fair city. In sanitary matters, we opine the nose of a stranger will gather convincing proof that the capital city of California is not as well regulated as was the City of Mexico under the rule of the Montezumas. We have in Sacramento two small but distinct elements. To the main body of the people respect is due—they have sense enough to do their thinking to themselves, and not impose it on their fellows. Jeremiah wrote magnificent chapters in the Old Testament; however he was a man of despondency. His first work can be, perhaps, excused; there was, however, no excuse for his writing his Lamentations, else he published them in the daily press of Sacramento. We are not aware that Jeremiah has been made an honorary member of our local Improvement Association; it is doubtless an oversight.

On the other hand, what is to be thought of this, which we extract from a daily contemporary. The man who penned it was a different type from Jeremiah, quite evidently:

Sacramento is one of the most healthy cities in the world. That cannot be gainsaid. She stands at the head of the cities of the world in cleanliness.

This fact is admitted by the most prominent medical men in the world.

The death-rate is smaller than many cities one-half the size of Sacramento.

Sacramento is the flower city of the universe.

Epidemics to her are strangers, and sickness is a rare visitor.

The streets are in a cleanly condition, and are kept so.

Recent reports regarding the healthfulness of the city have given rise to many reports, and The News to day presents the views of some of the most prominent physicians in the city.

A prophet of old said there was a time to laugh, a time to sing, and a time to dance, etc. Can we not laugh?

The result of the congressional elections last fall should be a warning to Republicans. This was brought about by the active work and organization of the Democracy, and by cunningly sowing the seeds of discord in the Republican ranks. Several of the western and northwestern States were divided through the Farmers' Alliances, which was part of the democratic plan of action. No southern Democratic State will be affected by any of these schemes, but each will roll up its accustomed democratic majority, free from the "People's party" and "Alliances." It is certain that the national contest in 1892 will be the most determined in American politics. We find the Democrats earnestly at work repeating their tactics of last year. They are distributing tons of literature calculated to reach the eye and ear of those dissatisfied Republicans who are now ready to snap at any bait thrown out, even under the name of "Alliance" or "People's Party." The only way to circumvent the enemy is to also work, and proceed to organize in every precinct. Industry and an intelligent system will bring out the invincible strength of the Republicans, and prevent those with imaginary grievances from following the illusive schemes prepared by the Democrats under the above mentioned names. We are glad to see that the Republicans of the capital city are alive to the necessities of the times.

The census bulletin of May 27, 1891, shows the total number of inmates of juvenile reformatories in the United States to be 14,846; an increase of 3,378 over that of 1880. It will be observed that there is no juvenile reformatory in Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Indian territory, Mississippi, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, or Wyoming. Generally speaking, there are juvenile reformatories in all the States of the North Atlantic division, and in all but two of the North Central division, while there are but three States which have them in the South Atlantic division, two in the South Central, and two in the Western. It is a noticeable fact that a majority of the inmates of these institutions are of foreign parentage. In respect to sex, it appears there are 11,535 boys and 3,311 girls in these institutions. A very large percentage of the crime and pauperism in this country springs from the criminal and pauper immigration from the old world.

The United States has more international questions on hand than any nation of the world. There are few who can comprehend the magnitude of the labor attached to the office of our minister of state. It is little wonder that the drain upon the energies of Secretary Blaine has weakened his physical strength, and that he needs rest. There is the Italian question, the clash with England on the Behring sea matter, the Chilean troubles, involving the intricate problem of neutrality laws; Canada, Newfoundland, and Spain are involved in delicate commercial relations requiring the first order of diplomatic skill; the Chinese immigration and diplomatic relations demand great thought. Taking all these diverse interests into consideration, the department of state has been placed in a position of severe trial. While our country is independent of the world, still there are diplomatic relations that demand our constant attention as one of the leading nations of the world. It is certain that the United States is an important factor in the politics of the old as well as the controlling element in the new world. George Ticknor Curtis says that Blaine's administration of the department of state is able, and that he clearly defines the relations of the government in all diplomatic matters. We trust the Secretary may soon resume his post of duty and honor.

Virtue, according to Horace, is always found between two vices. There never is any real good without a corresponding degree of evil. Our people just now are experiencing a surfeit of the latter. It is not that the moral atmosphere is any denser than at other times, but there is an application of an old proverb—"misfortunes never come singly." The epidemic of crime will spend its force, and even these evils will result in cleansing the moral atmosphere. Those things which we deem great, unbearable evils often redound in the greatest good. The war and pestilence which devastates the earth serves the most beneficial ends. Indeed, our greatest evils prove blessings in disguise. It may seem difficult to bring our mental vision upon this process of reasoning, but it is a truth withal. The injuries inflicted upon a few of our fellow citizens by the robbers and thugs have aroused the people to a realization of our situation. Reforms that never would have developed are now in a fair way of being adopted, which will purify the body politic for generations. It requires desperate crimes to arouse the people to the proper degree of desperation—in other words, the necessities of the hour.

There is such a thing as excessive goodness, and from this is often adduced excessive evil. The very good and righteous in a community often defeat the ends of righteousness. As an illustration, the radical temperance people defeat genuine reform by their ultra demands. Excellent moral regulations have been defeated, repealed and rendered dead letters by a too zealous advocacy of prohibition. The same may be urged with regard to excessive high license for any particular branch of business. It is well to "be not righteous overmuch." Avoid fanaticism and excess on any subject. We are not invited into this world to be angels or demons. We may strive to either, but always fail. Thus, in the contemplated reforms in the conduct of the body politic, there should be adopted the middle and, of necessity, the safer course. All radical extremes should be avoided. We have digested Major McLaughlin's ordinance regulating the retail liquor traffic, and we think it is by all means the safer middle course. If it becomes the law, the next step should be the prompt action of the Board of Supervisors to make the city and county ordinances and regulations uniform in their effect and operation. Such a course would avert much confusion, and not impose unnecessary difficulties on those who are legitimate business men.

Census on Insanity.

The census authorities are judicious in warning the public not to rely too much upon the natural conclusions of their statistics in the matter of insanity. The compilations show an increase of inmates of insane asylums in the decade of 41,330, or at the rate of 73.53 per cent., while the growth of the country was but 22.5 per cent. in that period. This showing would, without explanation, induce some solicitude. The suggestion, however, is that the number and capacity of asylums have been greatly multiplied, and the remarkable increase of numbers of insane persons is in the sections where the provision for them has been notably great. Insane asylums, as a rule, are well filled. They seldom solicit patronage. The solution of the growth of the figures is, that as opportunities are afforded in asylums, the insane are sent to them. Thousands who have been cared for privately, because the asylums had no room for them, have been sent to the new or enlarged institutions. The humane tendency of the times has been shown in the better provision for them. Still, after all the allowance made in this direction, it is evidently true that insanity is increasing out of proportion to the population. It is found that the proportion of the insane is the greatest where the forces of life are most active. Indians in their primitive condition do not become demented, and it is believed that the proportion is small among the illiterate classes anywhere.

[Written for THEMIS.]

The most sacred place on earth should be the family homestead. Therein is created the domestic altar from which the smoke of the first devotion arises to the God of love, peace, and happiness. Therein all human love begins, ante-dating the birth of every son and daughter of the race. Therein is stamped the signal of character upon every human being. Therein commences the intelligence or ignorance, the virtue or vice, the wisdom or folly, the happiness or misery of every child of humanity. The home, then, is the most interior sanctuary, the holiest of the holies, and above all other forms should the family temple be revered and adored. Therein does every human being commence the worship of Almighty God in spirit and truth; and if all could continue in the holiness of infancy and childhood through life, the earth would rival the heavens themselves in beauty and bliss. From the family home is all government projected, and all society extended. If, therefore, there be corruption in the various departments of human action, let it be remembered that every stream of depravity has its spring tide under the altar of home. And yet, how slight is the popular reverence, how feeble the attachment of our people to the homestead. How small is the number of our American homes that are sufficiently attractive to secure the attachment of those who are born in the dreary places where our intelligent but avaricious population reside? How high is our appreciation of the home? Ask the ten per cent. shavers and speculators, what value they place upon the house of God, where the people must worship in the beauty of holiness, if they worship at all, and you get the reply, "it will not pay ten per cent., nor compound every sixty days!" The man of money cannot afford a home, because a rented home worth twenty thousand, commands but one thousand, while the money invested therein would bring two thousand at the most moderate calculation! Home, humanity, and all the joys within the reach of man, are nothing in the balance against money. Ask the lady of fashion, though a wife and mother, of what value is her home, and her actions speak louder than words, that it is a convenient place for depositing the paraphernalia with which she decorates herself for the fantastic worship of her deity, on whose altar she offers up father, mother, husband, children and herself in recompense for the hostless smiles of the brilliant pageants that glitter without, or rather within. Ask the petulant, the peevish, and the morose wife and mother how much she loves her home, and the answer is heard in the discord and turbulence which her evil disposition engenders. Ask the tyrannical husband and father how much of sacredness he attaches to his homestead, and the answer is seen in the outrageous blasphemies he perpetrates in the abuse of wife and children, and the uniform desolation within and without. Ask the treacherous wretch, who, like a snake in the grass, steals across the threshold of the happy home, and, coiling around the domestic altar, charms only to sting with its deadliest venom, what respect he has for the sanctities of home, the endearments of life, the bliss of virtue, or the sureties of happiness, and, without awaiting the profanity of his filthy tongue, I must call him the vilest of all scoundrels that touch but to blast and destroy! Such is the contempt with which our laws regard the home, that while they doom to disgrace and the prison the man that steals less than half a hundred, they let the corruptest of all scoundrels, that overwhelms the whole family with mortification and woe irremediable, escape unimpeached and unhurt. So lightly does our legal system appreciate the home, that it permits not one-half of our population a place on God's earth on which to build a family temple, wherein father, mother, son and daughter, can find peace, plenty, intelligence and happiness. On the contrary, our system so far exalts money above all that is holy, beautiful and glorious, that it sends its sheriffs and constables with their infamous writs into the bosom of the family! No! Send the seducer to the penitentiary for twenty years, exempt the whole of the homestead from execution, send the sheriff or constable within to arrest only the wretch who has thrown the household into disorder, that he or she may be tried and punished, and hold the unoccupied earth free for the establishment of homesteads. In addition, let all cultivate more the love of home—aim to make their abodes the most heavenly places, by beautifying without and hushing every note of discord within.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Mrs. Langtry is said to have won $250,000 at the Derby, and her creditors are mighty glad of it.

Eugene Bertrand, the new director of the Grand Opera House, of Paris, served an apprenticeship as a theatrical manager in the United States. He is 57 years old, and abandoned medicine for the stage.

The world's a stage, and each man is a player;

His work is good or ill, delights or shocks,

According as his conscience—dark or fair—

Is found presiding o'er the prompter's box.

—Harpers.

Mr. Barnes of New York was given last night at the Metropolitan, to a good house. The cast is not the same as when the drama was presented here before. Same bill to-night.

Duncan Harrison's combination, including John L. Sullivan, will appear at the Clunie Opera House on Monday and Tuesday evenings next. Curiosity may be set down as the reason for the full attendance on both nights.]

"And what do you think of Wagner?" asked a musical enthusiast, addressing a Philistine. "I think as a classifier and adapter of noises he was the greatest man that ever lived." "But his music?" asked the enthusiast. "I never heard any of his music," said the other. "Did he essay music?"

The project of a "theatre libre" in Boston is now mooted. The "theatre libre," or a free theatre, is one at which ambitious authors can have their plays acted—presumably at their own expense. The promoters of this enterprise are calculating upon a rush at the box office from the playwrights, and if they secure that the rush from the theater-goers will be an important matter in both senses of the word.

Playwrights and theatrical managers have a difficulty to contend with in Europe which is entirely unknown in the United States. They are obliged to take into consideration not only the taste and the disposition of the public, but also the character and the temper of the arbitrary government official who acts as censor of the stage. As a rule he is a man of narrow mind, of numerous prejudices, and of petty, officious character.

Anita Fallon has just completed a four-act comedy which she has called "Boys Together." Its story is of sustained interest and thoroughly original, and the dialogue is brilliant and witty. Played by a company who thoroughly understand the possibilities of the higher form of comedy there can be no doubt it would achieve success. Miss Fallon should have in "Boys Together" a very valuable property.—S. F. Music and Drama.

It is with deep regret we chronicle the death of Harry Edwards, that old-time popular actor and manager. Harry Edwards was one of the most popular actors on the stage, and a gentleman of culture. He was the warm personal friend and companion of John McCullough in his palmy days; indeed, the success of McCullough was largely due to the skill and management of Harry Edwards. Mr. Edwards was a scientist as well as actor. His love of natural history was proverbial, and during his lifetime he made a valuable collection of rare specimens in that branch of science. He was about the last of the old school of actors.

Dancing is a natural form of expressing joy or anger. Men and women dance for pleasure, and frequently it may be noticed that children dance to express their anger, or to find vent for what is called bad temper. There are ladies who dance as a relief for impatience, but the majority of the fair sex love to dance for the agreeable social exercise it affords. Dancing is, figuratively speaking, as old as the hills. The Egyptians and the Jews indulged in solemn dances at their festivals. The Jews became sacrilegious some time before David had danced before the ark and pirouetted around the golden calf. The Greeks subsequently introduced dances aided by a chorus into their theaters. Their Bacchic dance was, however, religious in character, and was not only consecrated to Bacchus, but to all their other duties. Theseus instituted a dance at which himself and a numerous band of noble youths waltzed around the altar of Apollo. From Greece the dance crossed the Adriatic, and Rome adopted it as a detail of her festivals. In the reign of Augustus, Pylades and Bathyllus created a sensation by the introduction of what may be called a ballet d'action, wherein the participants danced and acted certain parts, which founded the school of pantomime. Since that distant period dancing has made great strides, and every nation boasts of its own peculiar dance. The Russians have the mazurka, the Poles the cracovienne, the Hungarians the csardas, the English the Roger de Coverley and the hornpipe, the Germans affect the waltz, the Spaniards the sprightly castanet dances, the French what is technically termed fairy dances, the Italians classic dances, the Irish are fond of a jig and the Scotch a reel and highland fling.

Book Chat.

Mrs. Blotter (of a literary turn)—And, John, send up a gallon of midnight oil. All our best writers, I'm told, burn it.

The late oriental professor at Cornell University, Prof. L. O. Roehrig, had familiar acquaintance, it is said, with thirty different languages.

We cannot all learn to write like Shakespeare, but most of us, if we try hard, can learn to spell, and that was something Shakespeare couldn't do.

"When I was twenty," wrote Paul du Chaillu, the discoverer of the gorilla, "nothing would keep me out of Africa; now that I am older, nothing could possibly get me there."

Thackeray's "Vanity Fair," though written after its author had made a success as a novelist, was, nevertheless, refused by every reputable house in London, the writer finally being forced to bear half the expense of publication.

"It was truth the poet sang" when Josh Billings remarked that "it is better not to know so much than to know so much that ain't so." But there are persons and newspapers that seem persistently to forget the fact when gossiping about the affairs of their neighbors.

Hardly any better comment on the latest products of the ultra school of American realism in fiction is needed than the report that Ouida is protesting against their indecency. When Zola joins in the protests, our most advanced novelists will know how to rank themselves.

The late Count von Moltke was once asked to name the books which had exercised the greatest influence upon his life. In reply he mentioned the following: The Bible, Homer's "Iliad," Littrou's "Wonders of the Heavens," Liebig's "Letter on Chemistry," and Clausewitz' "On War." The works of Schiller, Goethe, Shakespeare, Walter Scott, Rankins and Carlyle he gave as those which he never tired of reading. The Iliad in translation he read when 9 years old.

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe entered on the study of Plato in the original only a few years ago, when she was nearing her seventieth year, and quite recently read for the first time the plays of Sophocles in the original. It is, in fact, this scholarly habit of constant study which finds the woman of seventy and more as vigorous in mental energy as the maiden of seventeen—it is this which has made her, as Dr. Holmes so felicitously said, "seventy years young" on that birth-day which all Boston celebrated two years ago. On May 27, by the way, Mrs. Howe will be seventy-two years.

Professional Chat.

The lawyers are a great help to the railroads because they express so many opinions.

Robert Ingersoll has had a reputation as an orator since 1858, when he was stumping Illinois for Senator Douglas. And time has not grazed his gift of eloquence around the edges.

A St. Paul law student fell into a well and nearly perished before he could get out. Truth is said to be located at the bottom of a well, and that being the case the young man was in closer proximity to that virtue than he will ever be during his professional career.

The statue of the late Hon. S. S. Cox, which has been paid for by contributions from the letter-carriers of the different cities, and is to be unveiled in New York on July 4th, is now completed. Upon the pedestal will appear the names of the cities subscribing, in which Boston will appear second to New York.

Ex-Governor Ames was once asked to pay a physician $1,000 for services which the wealthy patient did not consider worth that much. But as the medical adviser would not reduce the bill one cent, two checks for $500 each were sent in payment, one distinctly stating that it was for professional attendance, and the other "for extortion." The doctor framed the latter check and has it in view in his office to-day.

Speaker Reed is a graduate of Bowdoin College. By his classmates he is remembered as a tall, gawky country boy when he entered college, in '56. A friend told a story about the speaker's first declamation in college. Reed wrote one that didn't suit him, and he tore it up. And what do you suppose he finally settled upon? Not the tariff! It was "The Fear of Death," and it was the weirdest, quaintest essay a college boy ever prepared. You could always find Reed either in his room or else in the college library. He was a thorough student. Reed hasn't forgot any of his learning.

They do say that this is an exact copy of a letter one doctor in southwest Missouri wrote to a doctor living not a thousand miles from Joplin: "dear Dock I have a pashunt whos physical sines show that the windpipe has ulcerated off and his lungs have dropped down into his stomick I have given hym every thin without effect his fother is wealthy honorable influenshal as he is member of accembly and god nose I dont want to loss hym what shall i do ans by return male. Your frat. Jacob Johnson, M. D." It is to be hoped that the "ans by return male" enabled Dr. Johnson to restore the lungs to their proper place.

Some years ago, says the Boston Globe, General John M. Corcoran was engaged to defend, before a country Justice, a boy of nine years who had been arrested on the charge of killing a horse. The animal had been driven downhill at a very rapid pace, and, as Corcoran still maintains, the wagon had suddenly jumped forward and killed him. "Now, your honor is, of course, aware," said Corcoran, after considerable evidence had been adduced, "that until seven years of age a child is not considered capable, in law, of committing a crime; between seven and fourteen he may be adjudged capable if capacity can be proved. I respectfully submit, your honor, that in this case capacity has not been proved, and on that ground I ask the discharge of my client." "That is a very good point, a very good point, Mr. Corcoran," remarked the Court, sagely and reflectively scratching his head; and for a moment it seemed as if the lawyer for the defense had won. "But—but, sir, the horse was killed, wasn't he?" "He died," admitted Corcoran. The old man's eye gleamed rather too triumphantly for that of a judge. "And if the boy killed him, didn't that prove capacity?"

The Midnight Ocean.

It is the midnight hour; the beauteous sea,
Calm as the cloudless heaven, the heaven discloses,
While many a sparkling star, in quiet glee,
Far down within the watery sky reposes,
As if the ocean's heart were stirr'd
With inward life, a sound is heard,

Like that of dreamer murmuring in his sleep;
'Tis partly the billow, and partly the air,
That lies like a garment floating fair
Above the happy deep.

The sea, I ween, cannot be fanned
By even freshness from the land,
For the land it is far away;
But God hath will'd that the skyborn breeze
In the center of the loneliest seas
Should ever sport and play.

The mighty moon, she sits above,
Encircled with a zone of love,
A zone of dim and tender light
That makes her wakeful eye more bright;
She seems to shine with a sunny ray,
And the night looks like a mellow'd day!
The gracious mistress of the main
Hath now an undisturbed reign,
And from her silent throne looks down,
As upon children of her own,
On the waves that lend their gentle breast
In gladness for her couch of rest! —John Wilson.

Political Emancipation of the Jews.

The political and intellectual emancipation of the Jews, and their admission into modern society, begins properly with Moses Mendelssohn. Born in 1729, at Dessau, in Germany, he studied under Frankel, and was a friend of Lessing. By his philosophical writings, and still more by his translations into German of the Pentateuch and the Psalms, he contributed powerfully to the moral and intellectual improvement of his people; and by his exemplary life, more eloquent than all his writings, he succeeded in raising Judaism in the estimation of the christian world. He died in 1784, and his death was mourned not only by all the Jewish people, but also by literary men of all creeds and countries. His work, however, was not lost. He had given to the cause of the emancipation of his race a strong impulse, and it was continued by Wesseley, Friedlander and a galaxy of distinguished Israelites trained by his example.

At about that time we find in Berlin the famous and beautiful Henrietta Hertz, in whose salon used to meet all the intellectual and literary world of Germany. There it was that Mirabeau met Dohm, an admirer of Mendelssohn, and though a Christian, a co-worker in the Jewish cause. Mirabeau, who was there intrusted with a secret mission from the French government, conceived immediately the great advantage that France would obtain by heading the movement for the liberation and emancipation of the Hebrews, and wrote a report on the work in process in Berlin.

The Grumbler.

A grumbler is one whom nobody can please and who pleases nobody. He looks for selfishness in every motive and evil in every act; and he finds what he looks for. He grumbles at the weather, whether it is foul or fair, and at the harvest, whether scant or abundant. He grumbles at his wife, his children, his minister, at Christians, at the church, at the government; in short, he grumbles at everything but that at which he ought to grumble most, his own mean little self.

His life is a discord set to a grumbling key. His presence in the house is a guarantee of decided misery. He could be easily spared from the family who are tired of him, and from the community who are weary of him, but unfortunately he is long-lived.

The causes of this evil are several. Sometimes it is the result of heredity, sometimes it comes from an unfortunate training; it may come from the disappointments of life, and it may also come from conceit.

NOTES.

When a fellow is in good health and cheerful, with a few dollars in his pockets, he is on good terms with everybody on earth he does not owe.

The earth is gradually growing larger from the fall of meteoric matter. An astronomer estimates that the globe is annually pelted with 146,000,000 projectiles.

The Prince of Wales is a direct descendant of King Alfred, being the thirty-third great-grandson; thus the English throne has remained in the same family for over one thousand years.

In China all the land belongs to the state, and a trifling sum per acre, never altered through long centuries, is paid as rent. This is the only tax in the country, and it amounts to but about 60 cents per head.

A writer in Chambers' Journal describes the wonderful effect a young woman's singing had upon a drove of cattle on a Western ranch. The writer might have enjoyed equal opportunities for observation by attending the opera at Nevada.

If old Maxim is right, and old maxims usually do have some truth in them, we shall soon be able to fly and drop dynamite on folks from the blue empyrean. If that comes out true, foreign ironclads will be careful how they come over to interview us with hostile intent.

So the Prince of Wales carries his own counters as he travels from house to house among his friends seeking whom he may rope in at baccarat. Well, the only difference between his method and that of the American black-leg who carries loaded dice is, that the Prince is in expectation of the crown of England, and every American gentleman is a crowned prince from birth.

A thoughtful and considerate sobriety of mind, so that one always knows what he is about, and what he means to do, and what he means not to do, as contrasted with a headlong, impetuous and reckless mode of acting, is a cardinal quality in living a successful and a virtuous life. Men must think, and do so seasonably, if they would make the journey of life wisely. Every young man needs to learn this lesson.

Charles J. Wetmore has resigned his position as chief executive officer of the State Viticultural Commission. However, the office is not to be lost to the family, for Clarence J. Wetmore has been elected to the place. Now it will be Clarence's opportunity to manage the grape and wine business of the State with such thrift and economy as to enable him to purchase a valuable ranch in the Livermore or some equally rich valley of the State.

It is a significant coincidence that the Premiers of the United States and of Canada should have been prostrated almost simultaneously by overwork. Public office is usually regarded as a sinecure, full of dignities and perquisites, and with few duties that may not as a rule be delegated to others. But when the office involves the continuous exercise of high intellectual qualities, there is no station in life that can use up a man more rapidly or more thoroughly.

Some evening soon there will be a moonlight pleasure trip down the river by a club of young gentlemen and their friends. Their motto, so it is written, is "pleasure and sobriety." Has it come to pass that those youngsters have discovered the philosopher's stone by which they can keep sober and have their fun besides? If so, they had better make public proclamation of their method for the benefit of modern humanity. But it is an experiment, and we patiently await the result.

Yale College may justly plume herself on the fact that her graduating class this year will be the largest she has ever sent forth. In the class are fifty students who have supported themselves by private teaching, canvassing, and in other ways. As might have been anticipated, these self-supporting students have ranked highest in scholarship; and it is safe to say that their training in the art of getting a livelihood has been one of the most valuable studies in their college course.

Ignatius Donnelly will be the third party candidate for President. We suggest the following epitaph after the demise of the third party:

Forbear, good friend, to touch these bones,
For underneath these piled stones
Lies party third, ne'er to awaken,
Killed by Ignatius Donnelly Bacon.

We are keeping the cryptogram to ourselves, but there is quite enough in it to indicate that it was written by a very prominent poet.—Mail and Express.

It is an example of the fair and impartial administration of justice in the Courts of England to see the Prince of Wales occupying a seat by the side of the Lord Chief Justice during every day of the trial of the infamous baccarat scandal, in order that his presence may influence the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defense, the Prince being as deep in that mud as the defendants are in the mire. Yet English Court methods are held up to us as examples of perfect procedure.

It is not possible that a California gold miner could ever insult or injure a woman. We must hear from the other side before we can believe that the well known chivalry of the California miner has vanished. The story of Mrs. Virginia Wolcott of the outrage perpetrated upon her, is not in keeping with the generous impulses of the old-time gold miner. The acts of vandalism could only spring from depraved creatures whom it would be a libel to call men.

San Francisco Star: The famous Gordon Cumming, whose favorite game was hunted in the Asian jungles and African wastes, should not have left it to one of his family to bring down and bag a prince of the blood at baccarat in his own dominions. The lion is royal game; but the lair of Tranby Croft is more dangerous to royalty than the wilds of Asia, and Wales seems to be destined to wallow. Scotch Cumming may be sacrificed, but if nobility shall be stricken, royalty will be forced to tumble.

Last Monday a young man tired of the long walk of life that was before him, found an easy way of ending the fatiguing and monotonous tramp by jumping into the bay from one of the Oakland ferry-boats. All he left after him was his hat, which was found floating on the water. The telegram bearing the information graciously tells us that the inside of that head protector was inscribed "Best London Make." Was this an indication that the hat was the best that could be turned out in that town of baccarat princes, or that its late wearer was the perfection of creation hailing from London town?

A phantom surprise party was given last evening to Miss F. May Zimmerman, the popular and accomplished vocalist, at her home at 1614 K street. Among the distinguished visitors present were Chancellor Commander W. A. Gilbert and his estimable wife, L. E. Vandercook, W. H. Gibson, Frank L. Mallory, C. E. Dunkell, C. H. Lyons, and Misses Annie Robbins, Rose Jopson, Kittie Bateman, Jessie Logan, Mamie McCaw, Daisy Logan, and Minnie Stevenson. Misses Zimmerman and Jopson delighted the audience with a duet, and Mr. Charles M. Campbell likewise distinguished himself as a vocalist. Refreshments were served and the affair was voted a grand success.

He is only a printer. Such was the sneering remark of a leader in a circle of aristocracy—the codfish quality. Who was the Earl of Stanhope? He was only a printer. What was Prince Edward William and the Prince Napoleon? Proud to call themselves printers. The present Czar of Russia, the Crown Prince of Prussia and the Duke of Battenburg are printers, and the Emperor of China works in the private printing office almost every day. William Caxton, the father of English literature, was a practical printer. What were G. P. Morris, N. P. Willis, James Gales, Charles Richardson, James Parker, Horace Greeley, Charles Dickens, James Buchanan, Simon Cameron and Schuyler Colfax? Printers, all, and practical ones. Mark Twain, Amos Cummings, Bret Harte and Opie Reed are plain, practical printers, as were Artemus Ward, Petroleum V. Nasby and Sut Lovingood. Senator Plumb, of Kansas, and James S. Hogg, of Texas, are both printers; and the leader of science and philosophy in his day made it his boast that he was a join printer. In fact, thousands of the most brilliant minds in this country are to be found toiling in the publishing houses of large cities and towns. It is not every one that can be a printer—brains are absolutely necessary.

In a Chilian Prison.

Describing the horrors of solitary confinement in a prison at Santiago, Chili, Mrs. Fannie Ward says:

"One man of education and refinement kept himself in tolerable condition through his half year of solitary confinement by means of the use of a handful of melon seeds. As he was going in, somebody gave him part of a muskmelon. Strange to say, it was not taken from him, and he carefully hoarded the seeds, which he put to a variety of ingenious uses. With them, and from reckoning the number of times the food pan slid in and out, he contrived to keep track of the number of days of his incarceration; he invented games of 'solitaire,' which he played thousands of times in the darkness, and, to vary the monotony, he would throw away the precious handful, and grope around on his hands and knees until they were all recollected. He says that to those little seeds alone he is indebted for his almost miraculous escape from insanity, idiocy or death."

Young America's Day.

The citizens of Sacramento are alive to the spirit of '76. Some of the croakers put up a pitiful month, and wished to dispense with a gratification of the patriotism of Young America. A regular old-time celebration is in order, and the gentlemen who are directing things will see to it that our children shall not be deprived of an ounce of patriotism. There will be a parade with soul-stirring music, a rousing oration by a native Californian, Hon. Frank L. Coombs. Another native Californian, S. Luke Howe, will read the declaration of independence. The American eagle will spread his wings in grand style. Young America will rejoice in pin wheels, fire crackers, bombs and flags—there will be no flagging in enthusiasm. Tonight the General Executive Committee will meet to lay out further plans. The Literary Committee advise that the exercises be held in the Assembly Chamber. Rabbi Jos. Levy will officiate in the invocation, and Rev. J. B. Silcox will deliver the benediction. It is probable that Addie Carter will arrange the musical programme for the literary exercises, and that there will be some splendid selections rendered by a fine body of musicians. The only remaining shoal against smooth sailing is the "fireworks" question. Indeed, there has been a pyrotechnic display in the committee, but old pyrotechnic seems to have the best of it. The Literary Committee waited on Governor Markham yesterday and invited him to act as President of the Day at the celebration on July 4th. The Governor spoke warmly of the people of Sacramento, and expressed a willingness to comply with their wishes. He cordially accepted the invitation.

Tom Baker.

Our old-time friend Tom Baker is with us as manager of the Mr. Barnes of New York company. The memory of Tom Baker will never die out among the old residents of this city. In his day, while with us, he was always foremost in any public enterprise, and endeared himself to the children and charitable institutions, as well as to the general public. No one ever saw Tom Baker without a cheerful smile and kind word for all. His hand and pocket were always open. It is difficult to understand how he can travel around the world with those whose previous peculiarities are well known—stage people—and yet continue to have that genial disposition. We have heretofore, at Tom Baker's occasional visits, spoken of his generous impulses. Briefly, all can be said in the words "Tom Baker is one of God's men."

Republican Union League.

On Tuesday evening at the Court House there will be a meeting of all Republicans devoted to the cause, for the purpose of effecting a permanent league organization. Heretofore there has never been organized any other than temporary campaign clubs. This organization is intended to be similar to the Union Leagues throughout the Eastern and New England States. For many years the democracy have followed the lead of the Tammany, Manhattan, and Iroquois clubs, which indeed virtually control the party organization. The Union Leagues of the Republicans are rapidly shaping the course and policy of the Republican party.

Death of Guy Platt.

We note regretfully the death of Guy Thornton Platt, the son of P. E. Platt of the fruit house of W. R. Strong & Co. He was an extremely promising boy, and was but fifteen years of age. For six months he had suffered from inflammatory rheumatism, and it extended to his heart. He was a pupil in the Sacramento Grammar School, the same school from which his father graduated in 1870. Called away at an age of promise, and with the qualities he had, it is a bereavement that invokes sympathy, and to his parents we extend, as do their other friends, our sincere regrets.

Pacific Turn-Bezirk.

The fourteenth annual festival of the Pacific Turn-Bezirk will be held in this city on June 20, 21, and 22. There will be a general parade of the society under escort of the military. The festivals of this society are exceedingly enjoyable. Hospitality is an attribute of the Turn-Bezirk, as well as other German societies. A large attendance is expected.

An Important Document.

We have received from Signal Service James A. Barwick the annual Meteorological Review of this State for 1890. The volume embraces 118 pages of matter of extreme value.

Society's Exiles.

It is difficult to over-estimate the gravity of the problem presented by those compelled to exist in the slums of our populous cities, even when considered from a purely economic point of view. From the midst of this commonwealth of degradation, there emanates a moral contagion, scourging society in all its ramifications, coupled with an atmosphere of physical decay—an atmosphere reeking with filth, heavy with foul odors, laden with disease. In time of any contagion, the social cellar becomes the hot-bed of death, sending forth myriads of fatal germs which permeate the air for miles around, causing thousands to die, because society is too short-sighted to understand that the interest of its humblest member is the interest of all. The slums of our cities are the reservoirs of physical and moral death, an enormous expense to the State, a constant menace to society, a reality whose shadow is at once colossal and portentous. In time of social evils, they will prove magazines of destruction; for, while revolution will not originate in them, once let a popular uprising take form, and the cellars will reinforce it in a manner more terrible than words can portray. Considered ethically, the problem is even more embarrassing and deplorable; here, as nowhere else in civilized society, thousands of our fellow men are exiled from the enjoyments of civilization, forced into life's lowest strata of existence, branded with that fatal word "seum." If they aspire to rise, society shrinks from them; they seem of another world; they are of another world, driven into the darkness of a hopeless existence, viewed much as were lepers in olden times. Over their heads perpetually rest the dread of eviction, of sickness, and of failure to obtain sufficient work to keep life in the forms of their loved ones, making existence a perpetual nightmare, from which death alone brings release. Say not that they do not feel this; I have talked with them; I have seen the agony born of a fear that rests heavy on their souls, stamped in their wrinkled faces, and peering forth from great pathetic eyes. For them, winter has real terror; for they possess neither clothes to keep comfortable the body, nor means with which to properly warm their miserable tenements. Summer is scarcely less frightful in their quarters, with the heat at once stifling, suffocating, almost intolerable heat which, acting on the myriad germs of disease, produces fever, often ending in death, or, what is still more dreaded, chronic invalidism. Starvation, misery and vice—the trinity of despair—haunt their every step. The Golden Rule—the foundation of true civilization, the key-note of human happiness—reaches not their wretched quarters. Placed by society under the ban, life is one long and terrible night. But tragic as is the fate of the present generation, still more appalling is the picture when we contemplate the thousands of little waves of life yearly washed into the cellar of being; fragile, helpless innocents, responsible in no way for their presence or environment, yet condemned to a fate more frightful than that of the beasts of the field; human beings wandering in the dark, existing in the sewer, ever feeling the crushing weight of the gay world above, which thinks little and cares less for them. Infinitely pathetic is their lot.—B. O. FLOWER in June Arena.

LIFE IN NEW YORK CITY.

DOINGS OF THE WEEK IN KNICKERBOCKER TOWN.

The Theater Ticket-Sellers' Vade Mecum—The Imitative Son of a Famous Preacher—An Advertising Novelty—A Word About the Average Barber of To-day.

[Special Correspondence of THEMIS.]

NEW YORK, June 5th.

The events of the week about which people are talking most, are the opening of the Metropolitan Museum of Art on Sundays, admission to which is free on that day; the abolishment of the penny toll hitherto demanded of pedestrians who wished to "foot it" across the big East River bridge, and the annual parades of the police of New York and Brooklyn in their respective cities. Both the free opening of New York's great art show, and the granting of the gratuitous use of the bridge foot-path, were brought about after a considerable verbal struggle in which corporations and trustees were arrayed against the people, championed by the press, and as usual the people and the press were victorious, as why should they not be? A funny feature of the affair was the claim of at least four of the big newspapers that the victory belonged to each one of them solely and alone. For a real, old-fashioned, up-and-out case of self-puffery and monumental conceit, recommend me to one of the "enterprising" New York dailies. Of the Metropolitan police as a body, nothing can be said that does not redound to their honor. A handsomer array of wide-awake, swartly fellows was never paraded in any city. If there were any among the throngs which gathered to witness the passing of "the finest" who contemplated crime, the picture of these muscular, broad-shouldered guardians of the peace, nearly three thousand strong, should have discouraged them in their ambitions. There are a number of ignorant, chumpish fellows now on the "force" who merit only an immediate dismissal, but taken as a whole, the police of both Brooklyn and New York are a body of men to be proud of.

While lounging in the box office of one of Gotham's biggest theaters the other evening, I engaged the mild-looking young man who deals out paste-boards to patrons of the house, in a conversation which naturally turned upon the humors and vexations of his peculiar vocation. "There never was a more advantageous point from which to study the vagaries of human nature than that which is afforded by a seat behind the little glass window of a theater box office," said the man of tickets. "If people only knew how much Job-like patience and consummate tact is required by the incumbent of a theater box office, they would probably have more compassion on the miserable being who hands them their passports to the show. Barring baseball umpires, there is no other class of men upon whose head is heaped so much unmerited abuse as falls to the lot of the ticket seller. I have just drafted out a set of rules governing the conduct of box-office men, and I'm thinking very seriously of having them published for the edification of the public at large and the direct benefit of the downtrodden members of our profession. Here are a few of the suggestions that are thrown out for the guidance of the latter. To begin with, it is absolutely essential that the theatre Jack-in-the-box should be a mind-reader. Then he must be always polite, but never familiar. Should he ever assert what he fondly supposes are his rights, he should be discharged on the spot. He should never make a sharp retort—that is an unforgivable transgression. He should give every patron what seats he or she asks for, even though it becomes necessary to get them back from the person who purchased them a week in advance. The worst crime that a ticket seller can commit is to argue with a patron. No one experienced in the business will do that. Never ask 'how many?' 'what price?' 'what date?' You should know all these things, without asking. Wear a perpetual smile. Look pleasant when a man on the other side of the window calls you an infernal liar and a horse-thief. Beg his pardon profusely. He will then go away and call you a good fellow behind your back. If a lady takes up a position before the window and squanders the best part of an hour in selecting one of the cheapest seats in the house, it is best not to suggest that she send for her relatives and spend the summer in the theater lobby. She might become offended by such a proposition. When a man goes up to the ticket window and blows a cloud of smoke from a rank cigar into the face of the inoffensive purveyor of card-boards, the latter should sniff the air and smile as if the perfumes of Araby were greeting his nostrils. If the same man should hurry away leaving half a dollar behind him, call him back, or he will return later on and swear that he left a dollar. If your opinion of the play is asked, always praise it, no matter how bad it really is. It is business policy to do so, and people won't believe you anyway. Last and most important is it that the genuinely expert ticket seller should be familiar with the contents of all current periodicals, almanacs, time-tables, weather reports, etc., for if information is sought on any of these subjects, and the questions fired at you are not promptly and accurately answered, it were better that you had never seen the interior of a box-office. To use a Hibernicism, there is only one time in a ticket seller's life when he can feel perfectly at peace with the world, and that's when he's dead."

One of the annoyances which pedestrians are subjected to these days in New York, is the frequency with which the debris of some old building in course of demolition strews itself across one's pathway. It is impossible to walk half a dozen blocks in any direction without finding it necessary to make a wide detour in order to escape a crumbling wall or an avalanche of old lathes and dry mortar. Great pyramids of dust-laden lumber, broken bricks, and scraps of useless iron, wood, tin, and what-not-else, lay piled in confused masses all about the city's streets. Of course all this forebodes great building activity later on, but the staring, unsightly holes left by the removal of the old buildings are not things pleasant to contemplate. To the passer-by the sight of itself might not prove so distressing were it not usually accompanied by great blinding and choking clouds of lime dust, and a truly awful recklessness on the part of the men engaged in the business of destruction, in their manner of throwing around great chunks of lumber. But New Yorkers are as a whole a patient, long-suffering race. It is very fortunate for some people that this is so. If it were otherwise, the number of murders might be more frequent here than they are now, which I venture to say would in a great many instances be a decided gain to the city—especially if the slaughter occurred in some of our public offices.

There probably never existed a more striking resemblance between son and sire than that which exists between Frank Talmage and his father, the famous preacher, Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage. This likeness very forcibly presented itself when the younger Talmage preached for his father in the big Tabernacle to a congregation of nearly five thousand persons last Sunday night. There is not a single mannerism of the great Brooklyn divine that has not been duplicated in the person of his son. The latter's style of utterance, his every posture and gesticulation, his whole manner of delivery were as much like those of his popular father as any two things can become. An ordinary young man might well have felt abashed before such a multitude as that which confronted Frank Talmage when he stepped upon the great platform of the Tabernacle to preach the first important sermon of his ministerial career. But Frank Talmage is not an ordinary young man. His perfect ease and self-command almost evoked a round of applause. He bore the ordeal with as much composure as if he had been doing just this sort of thing for many years. He has only just rounded his twenty-second year. His voice was clear and steady; his step firm but elastic. After he had given out the hymn in that peculiarly inflexible tone of voice so familiar in his father, and the congregation having sung it, he read the story of Paul's defense before Agrippa, pausing between each passage to make explanations and comments, precisely the same as does the elder Talmage. To many of his hearers, Frank Talmage was a disappointment. They had expected to see and hear a man of some original parts, rather than a mere mimic of someone else, even though that someone else were no less a personage than the famous Dr. Talmage. Though his sermonizing was forceful and rich in those pleasing illustrations which abound in the discourses of his paternal model and master, young Talmage did not make a popular impression of the kind he thought he should. There is room for only one Dr. Talmage at a time on this planet, and if the youthful imitator of his noted father would strive to give more of himself in his preachings and less of his sire, he will, I think, find greater favor among thoughtful people, and at the same time escape a great deal of that barbed ridicule and adverse criticism which has so often been flung at the head of the eccentric but always original T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D.

Dropping in to my barber's the other morning—for even newspaper men indulge in the luxuries of the tonsor's shop now-a-days—my eye was attracted by a large placard printed in red and black inks and showing by drawings six different styles of hair trimming in vogue just now. By pointing out on the placard the cut most in harmony with one's own peculiar type of beauty, one could very easily convey to the knight of the shears and razor the exact style in which one wished to have his hirsute adornment chiseled. The best part of this exceedingly convenient cranial map (so to speak) was the fact that it was only a clever means used by the publishers in advertising that enterprising little magazine, the Cosmopolitan. In neat letters over the face of the placard was an announcement setting forth the superior qualities of the magazine named, but so unobtrusive was the advertisement that no fair-minded barber could refuse to give it a conspicuous position in his shop. To make the card doubly attractive, the drawings used to display the various styles of hair trimming were artistic and accurate portraits from recent photos of James Gordon Bennett, Col. Elliott F. Shepard, the late Lawrence Barrett (whose locks were of the soft, tight-curling kind), John Jacob Astor (reputed to be the richest man in America, and who looks like an imbecile), the present Marquis de Lafayette (who wears a bristling French "pompadour" growth on the top of his head), and Henry M. Stanley, who combs his hair—or has his wife comb it for him—after the usual simple fashion that has been popular for a century.

Apropos of barbers and shaving, it is the testimony of a great many men who have passed the meridian of life, that shaving as it is now conducted in New York barber shops is not the luxury that it was twenty-five or thirty years ago. A friend of mine, and an old New Yorker, who has spent the last two decades abroad, complained to me recently that he found Gotham barbers much less attentive and careful than they were in former years. "They are always in too great a hurry," said my friend. "I am one of those old duffers who heartily enjoy a careful, deliberate shave. It is a great nuisance to have to admonish the chap who lathers your face to proceed slowly. I would as soon think of submitting my face to the manipulation of a steam hash-making machine as to place myself in the hands of an average New York barber. Not that I like to spend a little vacation in the tonsorial chair. That is not necessary in getting a good shave by one who fully understands his art. In any of the European capitals one can get a really refreshing shave in eight minutes. Of course I can shave myself, but I find it a horrible bore, and my hand is not quite so steady as it once was. To be shaved by a man who is deliberate, painstaking and deft of touch, is an enjoyment which once experienced is ever afterward remembered. Shaving in its true sense is indeed an art, but nine-tenths of the so-called tonsorial artists of this town would be more successful in the line of hog sticking than as removers of superfluous hair from the human countenance divine." And the old man was right—correct in every particular, wasn't he? M.

Lost Part of the Outfit.

A Chinese wedding party in Canton recently lost one of the most important items in the wedding ceremony—the bride. The little lady had been carried to her bridegroom's home, hidden in the customary embroidered red satin chair, decorated with flowers, and put down at the door to await the auspicious moment for crossing the threshold. Her escort had come a long way and were weary, so they retired into a neighboring opium den and went to sleep.

They awoke late in the evening, rushed to the door, and concluding the bride had left, carried the empty chair back to its loft. Soon after, the bridegroom and his family, dressed in their best, lighted the candles and their incense sticks, laid out rice and the orthodox viands, and opened the door. No sign of either chair or bride.

They immediately decided that she had been carried off by brigands, and alarmed the whole district, the search going on fruitlessly. At last the distracted bridegroom woke up the chair-bearers, and they, struck by a sudden idea, ran off to the loft.

They opened the chair, and there sat the poor little bride, stiff, frightened and hungry. She had felt that she was being carried off, but dared not cry out, as no well-bred bride ought to open her lips till after the marriage ceremony. Hence all the trouble.

He Hung to His Traps.

"Talking about Bull Run," said the veteran, "that's where I won my stripes as Sergeant, and I got them just because I was too green to know any better. I was a little mite of a lad, and I got into the Third Connecticut as a drummer boy, but when we were in camp at Alexandria the drum major complained that I put the other drummers out of tune, and to my delight I was intrusted with a musket and place in the ranks. Our regiment stood in a field of long grass at Bull Run until the heavy fire compelled us to retreat across a brook. Soon we returned, then there was a crash of rebel cavalry, and I couldn't find my regiment. Instinct told me it had gone the Washington way, and I started out to look for it. The road was strewn with rifles and knapsacks, and I, thinking that each represented a dead man, was appalled with the extent of the slaughter. My musket and knapsack were my dearest possessions, and I never dreamed that anybody could throw them away willfully, even to save his life. I was in heavy marching order when I got into camp next day, and I was promoted to a sergeantcy as one of the only two that saved their accoutrements out of the wreck."

Planetary Years.

The number of days in the years of the principal planets in the solar system is as follows: Vulcan, 24.25 days; Mercury, 87.9693; Venus, 224.7008; Earth, 365.2425; Jupiter, 4,332.585; Mars, 686.9797; Saturn, 10,759.22; Uranus, 30,686.82; Neptune, 60,127.72.

"See here, my friend, that dog of yours killed three sheep of mine last night, and I want to know what you propose to do about it." "Are you sure it was my dog?" "Yes." "Well, I hardly know what to do. I guess I had better sell him. You don't want to buy a good dog, do you?"

Weeds are often made to typify sin; they more resemble truth, however, since if "crushed to earth they will surely rise again."

Republican Meeting.

THERE WILL BE A MEETING OF THE REPUBLICANS of Sacramento City and County at the COURT HOUSE, on Tuesday Evening, June 16, 1891,

AT 8 O'CLOCK.

For the purpose of hearing the reports of Committees previously appointed and adopting a Constitution and By-laws for a permanent Republican organization. All Republicans who are devoted to the principles of the Republican party and of promoting its interest—national, state, county and municipal—are invited to attend.

WM. M. PETRIE, President.
H. BENNETT, Secretary.

ORDINANCE NO. 29.

An Ordinance Regulating Saloons, Dance-houses, Theaters, and Places where Intoxicating Liquors are Disposed of by Retail, and Providing for Licenses Therefor.

The Board of Supervisors of the County of Sacramento do ordain as follows:

Section 1. It shall be unlawful for any person or persons to hereafter open, establish, or conduct, or cause to be opened, established, or conducted, any barroom, public saloon, theater, variety show, dance-house, or other place where wines, spirituous or malt liquors are sold by the glass, bottle, or otherwise, in less quantities than one quart, within the limits of the County of Sacramento, without first obtaining permission from the Board of Supervisors. The application for such permission shall be made by petition in writing to the Board of Supervisors, which petition must contain the names and signatures of a majority of the resident taxpayers in the election precinct, as it at the time exists, in which such saloon or place in which such liquors are to be dispensed is proposed to be opened or conducted.

Sec. 2. If, after due consideration of the same by the Board of Supervisors, the petition be favorably acted upon, it shall be the duty of the person in whose favor the petition was presented, and the prayer of which was granted, before opening the said place to file with the Board of Supervisors a good and sufficient bond, to be approved by the Chairman of the Board, with two sureties in the sum of $1,000, conditioned that the applicant shall maintain said place in a quiet, orderly and decent manner.

Sec. 3. A written verified complaint filed with said Board of Supervisors setting forth that any saloon or place mentioned in Section 1 of this Ordinance is conducted in other than a quiet, orderly, lawful and decent manner shall be foundation for action by the Board of Supervisors concerning the place complained of, of which both sides shall have due notice and the privilege of being represented in person and by counsel and producing and examining witnesses, the Board of Supervisors find the allegations of the complaint to be true it shall make an order revoking the license issued to the person owning or conducting the place complained of and shall declare the bond given in such case forfeited.

Sec. 4. On and after July 1st, 1891, persons conducting the business mentioned in Section 1 of this Ordinance and in compliance with the provisions hereof, must pay a license tax to the License Collector of said county in the sum of $30 quarterly in advance; provided, that all licenses in full force at the time of the passage of this Ordinance shall entitle their holders to continue business thereunder until the expiration of the same.

Sec. 5. All parts of Ordinances in so far as they conflict with the provisions of this Ordinance are hereby repealed.

Sec. 6. This Ordinance shall take effect and be in force from and after July 1, 1891.

BESSIE KNIGHT'S TRAMP.

It is near the close of a hot day in August. The air is still uncomfortably warm, and the cattle are cooling themselves in the shady brook which runs right through John Knight's farm.

Bessie Knight, the farmer's only daughter, is calling the cows from the cool waters of the brook.

"Co, boss! Co, boss! Co! co! co!"

The cows reluctantly wade out, climb the grassy bank and slowly walk on to where Bessie is standing with stool and milk-pail in hand.

Brindle, Cherry, Bess and Sue patiently stand, chewing their cud and rolling their large handsome eyes about, while the foaming milk streams into the bucket with musical rhythm.

Just as she has finished "stripping" the last cow and is about to leave, out of the hot, dusty road steps a tramp, all ragged and dirty. This much Bessie sees at the first glance. She is frightened, but as he raises the battered hat and she sees the sad, pale young face, the dark, pleading, feverish eyes, and his hair all grimy with the yellow dust of the highway, pity takes the place of fright.

"Please, miss, will you give me a cup of that milk? I am almost starved. I have never begged before."

He leaned on the fence as though tired out. Bessie filled the cup with milk. He took it with eager, trembling hand and drained it. He blushed with shame at his own eagerness.

"Thank you—thanks. You are very kind," Bessie looked at the tramp. He was quite young. Not more than 21, and in spite of the dust and rags he was handsome—marble pale face, dark eye, which had a pleasing look.

He raised his hat and stopped to give one swift, wistful glance at the country scene spread out before him. The white farmhouse on the knoll, the large barn to the rear, the broad fields of corn bearing high their tasseled plumes.

He sighed wearily and turned to leave, when a sharp pain stabbed him as with a knife, and he fell face downward in the dust of the road.

Bessie leaped the fence and raised him up and did her best to restore him. Finding her efforts did no good she ran to the house and called her father.

John Knight was a broad-shouldered, good-natured fellow, and when he lifted the poor boy out of the dust and saw his face pale and pinched with hunger he readily listened to Bessie as she said: "O, father, please take him into the house. He said he was almost starved."

"Yes, Bessie; his face shows that. Poor fellow," and taking the tramp in his strong arms he carried him into the house.

"Mother, here is a tramp Bessie found. He's very sick; we must do something for him," and Farmer Knight laid him on the bed.

"A tramp! My goodness gracious, John." Just then the boy opened his eyes. He heard the words and saw the look of horror that accompanied them.

A look of pain came into his face. "Only a tramp!" he muttered in an incoherent way, and again became unconscious.

"Poor boy!" said Mrs. Knight, who was really a very kind-hearted little woman, but like all farmers' wives had a mortal dread of tramps. She immediately began to bustle about to do something for him.

"He's no common tramp, father," she said. "You can see that from his looks."

"No, mother, he's just some young fellow that's out of work, and he's took to tramping because there was nothing else to do."

"Well, we'll do what we can for him. Suppose it was Tom or Harry?" said the kind-hearted little woman.

In a few weeks the tramp was able to be out.

One evening after he had been with the Knights three weeks, he walked out to the barn, where Mr. Knight was chopping feed for the cattle.

"Mr. Knight, I can never repay you your kindness; you have been, you and your family, my good Samaritan. Some day, who knows? I may be able to return it all. But I am well now, and—well, sir," and he flushed crimson. "Even a tramp may have some pride. I cannot stay here on your bounty longer; I must leave."

"Leave! No, indeed, you are not strong enough yet. Then, where are you going? What are you going to do? Back in the dust of the road? I need some help. How would you like to stay here and be one of us, be my hired hand? I will pay you $12 a month and board, and when you are stronger will pay you more. Come, what do you say?"

"Mr. Knight, I would like to stay, but you don't know what I am. You found me a tarving tramp, I may be worse."

"I don't care a continental what you have been, your eyes are honest. Bessie and mother and I have all talked it over; will you stay?"

The tramp looked around on the country scene and said, "I'll stay."

"Well, what's your name?"

"You may call me Charley—Charley

Smith—although, to be frank, that is not my name."

And so the tramp became "Knight's hired hand."

He worked honestly and faithfully. Bessie Knight, like most daughters of well-to-do farmers, had received a good education, and had quite a nice, well chosen little library.

It was not very long until she found that the hired hand was well read, and had good ideas of books.

Very frequently he would bring from town, to which he went with Mr. Knight, the latest books. These they would read and discuss.

One evening at the supper table Mr. Knight said: "Charley, how would you like to teach the school here. I am one of the directors, and I know you can pass the examination."

Charley demurred at first, but when Bessie and her mother joined Mr. Knight he agreed to take the school.

So the tramp became the district master, and a very successful one he made.

Now the young fellow found out that there was no one in the world like Bessie Knight, and he thought that he could see that Bessie regarded him in much the same way. But he never spoke to her until the school had closed.

He told them a few days before the close that he would go to C— when the term was ended.

He had thought of going away without telling Bessie of his love for her. But who is able to keep love from expressing itself?

Charley leaves in the morning.

Bessie is out in the spring twilight milking the cows. He walks out to the bars. "Miss Bessie," he said. She looked up with a start, and he saw her face flush in the dusk.

"Well, Mr. Smith," she said.

"No, that is not my name," he went on hurriedly. She had always called him Charley, and he had called her Bessie, with that informality peculiar to the country.

"Well, Charley, then," she said, and laughed.

"No, not, Charley, either, Bessie," and his voice is trembling.

"I am an imposter, Bessie. I am sailing under false colors. Even the name by which you know me is false. I am not worthy of your respect. I am or have been worse than a tramp. But my God, Bessie, I can't, O I can't tell you what I am! You would shrink from me. I could not stand that. I am going away in the morning."

He looks down. In the dusk her face is pale, and he sees her lips quivering. "And yet I have been so happy here." And he looks around the old farm wistfully.

"Bessie, I had thought not to tell you, but I must. I am not worthy to stand in your presence, but I love you. O Bessie, I love you!"

He had folded his arms lightly across his chest, and his face became white as when he leaped against the fence that evening—a starving tramp.

She arose from the milk-stool and came up to him. He shrank back. O, he loved her so! and, yet, for that very reason he must not even touch the little hand she stretched out to him. He was like a leper, he thought, and must stand afar off and cry, "Unclean!"

"Charley," and her hands are on his shoulders now. He sees her eyes aglow with the light of love.

"Oh, Bessie! Bessie!"

"Charley, I don't care what the past has been; I don't care what you were, I only care, I only know, I love you."

"Listen, Bessie. Three years ago a young man just out of school began to clerk in a large store in C—. He won the confidence of his employer. After awhile—I must make the story brief—he fell in with a lot of young fellows who were 'fast.' It is the same story repeated every day in the large cities. He became dissipated. He—he gambled, he drank. One night while drunk he staked $500 of his employer's money, and lost. Next morning he awoke sober and knew he was a thief. He listened to the set who had ruined him, and, coward like, fled. He became a tramp. Bessie, you know the rest. Bessie, I—I am a thief." How he writhed as he said the word!

She put her arms around his neck and would have kissed him, but he gently unwound her hands, saying: "No, Bessie, I am not worthy to kiss you now. Listen, I am going back to C—, tell them all, take what punishment they may inflict, then work hard, pay the money, and then—"

"Come back to me, Charley, I will wait." That night he told Mr. and Mrs. Knight all.

They loved Bessie, and if she loved him they would consent. * * *

Three times the corn in the bottom land has tasseled and rustled its sword-like blades.

"Co, boss; co, boss; co, co, co." Bessie

Knight is again calling the cows. As she calls, up the dusty road some one is coming. The "some one" comes up to the fence, leaps it.

"Bessie—Bessie!" She turns with a glad cry, "Charley."

"I am free, darling, free! They took me into their service. It's paid, and I am free, free!"

He gathers her close in his arms and rains warm kisses on her upturned face.

Ghosts.

A turn of the head, a gesture slight
Of that girl unknown in the window there,
Recall in a flash to my mind the night,
The fateful night, of our parting—where
We stood opposed—her angry glance—
Her small hands clenched in passionate rage;
Ah! that was the end of our romance,
And we both wrote "Finis" upon the page.

And yet, was it ended, when here to-night
A girl's slight movement, as it appears,
Can call up memories, clear and bright,
That I thought were dead for all the years
Of life for me? And the thought comes now—
If she, by chance, some man should see Whose face or whose ways were mine, somehow—
Just what and how would she think of me?

Endurance of Man.

Man has greater powers of endurance than any other animal. He is the only animal that can endure all varieties of climate, and live in either the hottest or the coldest. Man can subsist on all kinds of food, and his tenacity of life is almost marvelous. The only animal that can compete with man in powers of endurance is the camel, which can live for ten or even fifteen days without water, and can perform its tedious journeys across the arid deserts of the East for days without nutriment. The camel not only carries its own supply of water, but has in its hump a natural storehouse of nutriment upon which it can draw as occasion requires. The flesh of which the hump consists is gradually drawn into the system, and no Arab will allow his camel to start on a journey until its hump is in perfect condition and hard to the touch. Little is seen of it by the time the animal reaches its destination but folds of skin lying loosely on the back. The reindeer probably stands next to the camel in powers of endurance. It is capable of drawing a sledge containing a load of 200 pounds at the rate of ten miles an hour for twelve hours. It is said that one of these creatures carried a Swedish officer, bearing important dispatches, 320 leagues in forty-eight hours, an uninterrupted pace of 6½ leagues an hour; it died at the end of the journey, and its portrait is in the palace at Stockholm. It is said that the reindeer will trot sixty miles without stopping, but will seldom recover from the exertion. A case is mentioned of a stag and hounds in the north of England. The run is supposed to have been 120 miles in length. The deer regained its park and fell dead, the two hounds that had kept up the pursuit dying close beside it.

Dog Days.

The dog days last from the beginning of July to August 11th. The popular theory is that they are so called because dogs then go mad; but the notion is etymologically false, beside being untrue in fact. Dogs, strange to say, are rather less liable to rabies than at other times. "Dog days" is really a translation of the Latin "dies caniculares"—the twenty days before and the twenty after the heliacal rising (that is, appearance in the morning just before the sun) of the star Sirius, whom the Romans called "Canicula," or "little dog." The ancients attributed a most malevolent influence to this star—our "dog star," and sacrificed a brown dog to it to appease its rage. If this were not done they thought that the sea would boil, the wine turn sour and dogs begin to grow mad, the bile increase and all animals grow languid. It is unnecessary to say that, in the course of some ages, Sirius will rise at midwinter instead of midsummer. Perhaps some wise-acres, like those who are ready to believe in dog days and new moons changing the weather and similar impossibilities, will then give him credit for the frost and snow.

Custom of Bell Tolling.

The tolling of bells at funerals has its origin in pagan custom. During the dark ages bells were popularly supposed to have the power of driving away evil spirits and thus came to be used when persons died; that is, on the "passing away" of the soul to the future world, hence the term "passing bell." This custom, like many others of pagan times, was adopted by the early church, the bell being tolled as an invitation to Christians to pray for the departing or passing spirit. The venerable Bede mentions that at St. Hilda's death one of her nuns, at a distance from Whitby, heard suddenly the well known sound of the bell which roused or called them to prayer when one departed from this world. This shows that funeral bells were used in the church in the sixth century. St. Sturn, when dying, ordered all the bells of his convent to be rung.

Under the directions of the German ministry of worship and education, the famous Croy tapestry of Grettswald University, has been sent to Berlin to be mended. This tapestry, which pictures in life-size figures the grand ducal families of Saxony and Pomerania at the feet of Luther, was given to the university in 1680 by the duke of Croy. Every ten years the tapestry is exposed, and a great festival is held in honor of the occasion. All the rest of the time it is secluded from sight.

Reuben's Old Dad.

I got off at a small railroad station in Tennessee to find a crowd in front of a saloon, and as I began inquiring the cause of the excitement a young man of twenty turned and replied:

"Stranger, I kin tell ye all about it. Do ye want to see the corpse?"
"Then some one is dead?"
"Dead as a coon-track, and it's my old dad at that!"

"Been a row here?"
"Not a bit of it. Dad jest made a fule of hisself. He's in thar' waitin' fur a cart to take hisself home to be laid out and buried."
"Never seed unthin' to ekal it in all my bo'n days!" said a man in the crowd.

"I was right here, or I wouldn't hev sniggered to it, no how," added a second.
"It was jest this way, stranger," continued the son as he picked a sliver off a pine box and began to whittle at it with a spring-back jackknife. "Dad an' me comes down yere this mawin' to buy a mawl. Dad was powerful frisky all the way down, and he sez to me, sez he:

"'Reube, I kin out-walk, out-run, out-shute, out-holler, and out-lick anythin' on top of this yere airth's surface, and I'll bet our farm agin a drink of Nashville whisky on it!'"

"I sees dad was purty clucky, and I sez to him, sez I:

"'Dad, you's top of the heap around here, and nobody kin deny, but doan' you go and meet up with no fight in town. We's arter a mawl, we is, and we doan' want no fussin' nor nuthin'.'" "

"And with that dad jumps fo' feet high and cracks his heels together and whoops out that he's b'ar-traps, pizen, powder and catamount, all biled down into one, and that he's dangerous if anybody goes to pick up his hind foot."

"Yaas, and I hears him holler when he's a mile away," said one of the crowd.

"Of co'se you did," replied Reuben, "of co'se. Dad was powerful on the holler. H'd holler a b'ar out'n a tree half a mile away. When we got down yere thar' was a feller from Memphis with a patent liftin' masheen a-standin' right yere. Thar's the pieces of it agin the fence, while the feller hisself is ten miles away and still runnin'."

"But twasn't his fault," protested a man on mule-back.

"I ain't sayin' as 'twas," placidly answered Reuben. "I'm a-sayin' as dad got unixed up and made a fule of hisself. No sooner had he sot eyes on the masheen than he cracks his heels together and crows like a rooster, and sez to me, sez he:

"'Reube, I kin pull the hull durned State of Tennessee right up by the roots if I kin git a brace fur my feet, and I'm a-goin' to try it.'" "

"I tried to sly him off by talkin' mawl, but dad was powerful sot in his ways, and he crows some more and hollers:

"'Whoop—whoop! Lemme git hold of them 'ere handles, and all yous who don't want to tip over when the airth comes up had better hang to the fences! Reube stand back and gimme room!'" "

"Yaas, I heard him say them remarks," put in one of the crowd.

"So'd I," added half a dozen others.

"Of co'se he said 'em," continued Reuben—"of co'se. Nobody's denyin' that he said 'em. Dad jest figgered on pullin' most of this yere airth up as easy as you kin lift the top crust of a pie. He spit on his hands, grabbed them 'ere handles, and when he straightened up I jest felt the ground trimplin' all around."

"So'd I!" called seven or eight voices in chorus.

"Dad had one side of the hull county lifted up two foot high, when there was a rip and a smash—them handles tore out, the masheen flew to pieces and the airth smk back with a chugg, which made us dizzy."

"Then your father had broken a blood-vessel or something of the sort?" I queried.

"Skerce, stranger—skerce. Dad wadn't no man to stop at one blood-vessel. He jest busted hisself all to pieces, and was a goner afore we could reach him. I might say he sort o' run together and caked. He was six feet high when he grabbed them handles, and now you can't make him over four foot ten as he lies in thar' on a board. Jest pulled his knees up and his shoulders down, and I reckon his lungs would hold his galluses up if thar was any buttons on 'em. The man who owned the masheen wasn't to blame—of co'se he wasn't—but when he seed the calamity he started for Knoxville on the jump, and he was jumpin' when he turned the co'ner of the hill up thar! Dad's in yere, stranger. Come and take a look. Mighty good man, dad was, but a leetle too coltish when he had about fo' drinks of applejack under his shirt bosom. Crowd back thar, boys, and make room! Doan' act like you never dun met up with a calamitous spectacle befo'!"—M. Quad in N. Y. World.

A small goat ate a tomato can
And then eight pounds of nails,
He finished his meal, by way of dessert,
By consuming four large fence rails.
He said to himself, with a jovial smile,
As off to his home he ran:
"I'm sure the nails can't disturb me,
But I think the tomato cau."

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of J. C. Bainbridge, an insolvent debtor. J. C. Bainbridge having filed in this Court his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said J. C. Bainbridge is hereby declared to be insolvent. The Sheriff of the county of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal of the said debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered. It is further ordered that all creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the county of Sacramento, in open Court, at the court room of said Court, on the 19th day of June, 1891, at 1:30 o'clock P. M., of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor. It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the county of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors. And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. Dated, May 11th, 1891.

W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge of the Superior Court.
WM. A. GETT, JR., Attorney for Petitioner.

Educational Advance in the South.

The latest census bulletin gives much interesting information as to the state of public education in several of the Southern States where it has been supposed to be most backward. Mississippi is one of these States, and the facts show that while during the last decade the gain in population was but 14 per cent., the school enrollment gained nearly 48 per cent. A still stronger showing is made by Arkansas, which gained in population nearly 41 per cent. and in the public school enrollment 106 per cent. Still more notable has been the educational progress in Texas, where the gain for the decade was 133 per cent. in school enrollment and a little less than 41 per cent. in population. In Mississippi the colored enrollment exceeds the whites, the figures being, respectively, in round numbers 193,000 and 157,000. In Arkansas the number of whites enrolled is 163,000 and the number of colored 59,000. In Texas the disparity is greater, the number of colored pupils enrolled being 98,000 out of a total enrollment of 410,000. In the three States there are a little over sixteen thousand white teachers and about seven thousand colored teachers.

If you want to keep your beauty intact have plenty of sleep. Want of proper rest will age a woman quite as much as anxiety. A certain lady, high in the social world, makes it a rule to stay in bed one day a week in order to sleep off all feeling of fatigue. Women who believe in the "beauty sleep," and get two hours' sleep every night before 12, manage to keep fresh and un-wrinkled up to thirty-five. It's seven hours for a man, eight for a woman and nine for a fool, according to the old saying; but many ambitious women complain that they have to do with six hours' sleep, as their social and other duties are so heavy. Women can stand late hours better than girls. Many women make it a rule to have a nap every afternoon.

THEMIS

Vol. III.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, JUNE 20, 1891.

No. 18.

THEMIS: Published weekly, by D. JOHNSTON & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
W. J. HASSETT, Managing Editor.

The decision of the Supreme Court of Missouri with regard to the methods used by certain alleged collection agencies in this country, might furnish those engaged with food for thought. A young lady of St. Louis visited an interior town of Missouri, and on her return to her home was followed by a bill of $3.50 for goods alleged to have been sold to her during her visit. She claimed to have paid the bill, but had no receipt. The merchant placed the bill in the hands of a Chicago collecting agency, who annoyed her with notices that injured her reputation. She sued the merchant for libel and was awarded $500 damages. An appeal was taken, and the Supreme Court of Missouri a few days ago affirmed the judgment. The point settled is, that a merchant who employs these notorious black-mailing agencies is liable both for civil damages and to criminal prosecution. It amounts to a judicial declaration that debt is not necessarily a crime or disgraceful.

The Board of Trustees gave it to be understood that all the legislation regarding the liquor traffic would be directed against the disreputable places and "dives." The accomplishment of the closing up of all disreputable places is so easy under the great police power in that body, that it goes without saying. There is no necessity for any additional ordinances for the consummation of that object. A simple edict, "We will not issue any license to a disreputable place," would end the matter. It is now proposed to levy the additional license for revenue only, and not as a reform measure. This increase of burden is not in accord with the spirit of the law, which declares all taxes must be equal and uniform. In fact, an undue proportion of the expenses of government is imposed on a particular class. Now, if this was exacted for regulating purposes, and with a view of destroying the disreputable places, there could be no question of the legitimate right to do so. But when we consider that the dives and disreputable places would thrive under the contemplated burden and restrictions, and that the injury and unequal restrictions and taxes would fall on the innocent and legitimate business men, it is time to look upon the situation in the light of political economy and science of government. The midnight regulation, at first glance, seemed proper; but a closer consideration of the subject discloses that the restriction would fall heavily on many legitimate dealers, while the lawless and disreputable places could easily evade the provision, and continue their nefarious business amid the cloak of darkness elsewhere. It is, then, no reform to add to the burdens of the legitimate business man, or to impose restrictions that would injure him, while the lawless could thrive.

The enforcement of this midnight ordinance might and would work an injury upon the city. Hundreds of people are arriving and departing from this city after midnight, and liquid refreshments are demanded by them. Political conventions will certainly not come to a city where there is an attempt to regulate the appetite of the delegates. Our legislators are not generally noted for their temperance proclivities. In fact, this regulation, on mature reflection, has the smack of a sumptuary enactment. The people of Sacramento do not want to kill enterprise. Now, would not the restrictions and burdens imposed in the name of revenue inflict a blow on those gentlemen who have expended $600,000 in that brewery enterprise? We understand that the brewers and wholesale dealers will guarantee not to furnish supplies for dives or disreputable places, and will aid the authorities to abolish them. We have an illustration of the evil effects of the midnight ordinance through the Turn Bezirk which assembles here to-day. The enforcement of the midnight restrictions on them would certainly deter them from again coming to this city. The visitors to the State Fair would not relish the idea that their appetites should be regulated by ordinance. Such unnecessary regulations would only serve to drive away all public exhibitions or conventions. Even the legislature and State fair might be taken from us. Sumptuary laws are not popular with the American people. The tax proposed by the trustees is unjust and unequal. The large and small dealers are taxed alike, which is contrary to the spirit of the law.

The poet has always sung peans to midnight's holy hour. The silence of the hour has been likened unto a gentle spirit brooding over dreaming sorrow. There is no room for poetic fancy in our large cities. No midnight's holy hour appears. In these days of push and rush with the ceaseless and uneasy trend of busy commercial life there is no rest. Busy enterprise is no respecter of hours, and the heretofore solemn chimes of the midnight bells bode anything but silence, sleep, and rest. The rumble and whistle of approaching and departing trains bearing their cargoes of freight, human as well as the golden treasure, are heard at all hours from dewy eve to early morn. Restless humanity is constantly on the move. It is true the great mass of respectability sleeps—the daily toilers rest. It is true that the hideous skeletons of crime stalk forth after midnight's holy hour, and hold their lawless carnival. There is a general unmasking when church yards yawn and graves give up the dead. Hollow cheeks and jagged teeth are exposed. Revelers embrace the skeletons and haunt the shadows of sin, and sip the scum of what they call pleasure. It is after midnight that the secret closet doors of many habitations where peace and honor are thought to dwell, are opened and the skeletons join the procession and march along where the red lights of sin and shame are exposed. The darkness of midnight hides much of the threadbare character and permits the glitter of tinsel being taken for gold. The demon Asmonens does not, however, have to go upon the streets, or amid the dim lights of sin, to reveal the acts and thoughts of humanity. He peers beneath the roof of respectability, and there reveals often the greatest vices. Vice sows under a bright sky. Pleasure sips in the day, and staggers at night.

Laws are enacted to prevent evil. Officers are appointed and detailed to detect crime. But in the dread silence of night all laws and officers are powerless. The skeletons hold high carnival undisturbed. Does not the push and enterprise of the present tend to avert crime? The bright lights of business houses, burning on every block; the rumble of carriages to and from the arriving and departing trains; the tread of pedestrians in their pursuits, or the traveler coming or going, would seem to afford no room for the procession of skeletons, or for the thug or thief. It is only in darkness that these can thrive. It is only when the great mass of respectability slumbers, that evil holds sway. Plots are planned in the light and executed in the darkness. Is it not safest and best that legitimate business enterprises should be encouraged after the dread solemn hour of midnight? Would not the presence of the bright light and respectable enterprise deter the criminal? Those who have lived in the country and experienced the lonesome silence of the night, can attest what a feeling of pleasure there is in even hearing the gentle mooing of old bossy, or the complacent grunt of the self-satisfied swine. The quiet of night is always solemn and sad to the wakeful.

Men occupying public positions, and upon whom great trusts are to be imposed, should be thoughtful and independent. Act according to the dictates of conscience, and never strive to please ever croaker that has advice and counsel to give. It is impossible to please everybody. The old fable of Æsop will apply where the farmer and his son drove their ass to market for sale, trudging contentedly alongside. They passed some young girls who railed them for fools because they walked when they could ride, so the old man told the boy to mount. Then they passed some men who screamed in passion at the illustration of disrespect to age in the boy riding while the father walked. So the old man told the boy to get down while he mounted. Then they passed some old women who railed at him for a selfish old man in making the boy walk while he rode, so he told the boy to mount behind him. Then they passed some young men who cried in ridicule at two able-bodied men riding a little beast, saying they were better able to carry it instead of it carrying them. So the old man bade the boy get down, and doing so himself they tied the feet of the ass, strung him on a pole and started to carry him. This attracted a great crowd whose ridicule made such noise as frightened the ass, which wriggled itself loose just as they were on a bridge, and falling into the stream was drowned. The old man's reflection was that in trying to please everybody they had pleased nobody, and lost their ass into the bargain.

The thorough education of a young woman or a young man means a broadening of their ideas, a desire to be advantageous to their day and generation. Science is not studied for knowledge only, but for the power to put that knowledge to some practical use. We can be proud of our young women, not only for their successes in many of the avocations and their attainments, but for their unselfishness and usefulness. An exchange says: "The women of America are progressing in all directions at such a rate as to call forth comment from many parts of the world. They have taken off their little pinching, thin-soled shoes and let their toes spread out. They consequently walk more in the open air. They have untied their corset strings and breathe freer. They have cut down and opened up the high collar and can turn their heads about freely. They formerly knew little about personal comfort, and now they long for it. The young girl clings to her tennis or boating suit, while the older sister and mother wear their bed-room gowns as late as possible, and create occasions when they can appear in tea gowns. To the stout woman has got to come some new form of dress, something entirely different from that we now have, and when women are as free as birds and look well, then we will have really advanced. An anatomist of national reputation says that women—that is, women generally—will not be able to do the brain work of men until the arterial blood is not restrained in passage by the bands, gages, bones or steels."

[Written for THEMIS.]

Truth is eternal. It is vested with omnipotent energies. When the Son of God came down from heaven and assumed our nature, he said, "I am the Way, and the Truth, and the Life." Truth, then, is allied to the Diety. In the administration of the Divine Government, truth occupies a commanding position. It holds companionship with mercy, and peace, and righteousness of God. When righteousness looks down from heaven well pleased with the moral changes taking place among the children of men, truth is springing out of the earth, as if to indicate that the land shall fully yield her increase when the precious seeds of truth are everywhere deposited on the soil. When mercy and peace unite in any work of benevolence, it is with the coöperation and approving smiles of Truth. Is a sinner forgiven? Truth satisfies the sentence of pardon. Is the Christian believer sanctified? This is done in accordance with the prayer of Jesus—"Sanctify them Thy truth—Thy word is truth." Is the worship of God enjoined upon us in the Holy Scriptures? Even this great duty of honoring God must be performed not in spirit only, but in truth. How often do we hear that true remark, that "truth is mighty and must prevail." The moral history of the world illustrates the correctness of this aphorism. Truth is always sure of a final triumph in every conflict. It is invincible. It is mighty in all defensive operations. It has, moreover, an aggressive mission in the world. It shall invade the territories of the ancient "Father of Lies," and overthrowing "principalities and powers," shall bear the trophies of conquest into every land and nation under heaven. Before the triumphant march of Truth shall alien armies be put to flight; the mighty ramparts of infidelity shall be demolished; heathen temples shall be left without worshipers, and the blighting curse of religious error, and all organized opposition to truth shall cease to exist. Who, then, will have the hardihood wantonly to assail the truth? Let such a one know that his course is sure to involve him troubles of a serious nature, and the end shall be degradation and ruin. Truth can never be destroyed. It may be for a time obscured by error, derided by ignorance, and assailed by persecution. It may be overborne by hostile forces and "crushed to earth," as the poet has expressed it; but it will rise from the conflict and show forth its irresistible power in demonstrations "terrible as an army with banners." Truth, heavenly truth, like the sacred oracles of olden time, is "a light shining in a dark place." Happy are they who walk in its light. They shall see good days in the land of the living; their path shall be as the shining light that shineth more and more to the perfect day. As the sun in the midst of heaven, so is truth—it has light in itself; it shineth in the darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not. It shall continue to shine in spite of the darkness that covers the people. It shall shine on in spite of all malice, in spite of all persecution, and in spite of all the combined opposition of earth and hell. And although the very clouds and smoke of the bottomless pit should commingle and roll up in dense masses from beneath, and cast their dismal shadows around the truth, and threaten to enclose it in the darkness of an eternal night, yet would the truth be seen struggling for the mastery; and darting its bright and burning beams through the sullen gloom, would chase away the darkness, and dissolve every cloud, and light up all the earth around with its heaven-born splendors.

Arab Maxims.

Here are five Arab maxims which have underlying them a bedrock of truth: Never tell all you know, for he who tells everything he knows often tells more than he knows.

Never attempt all you can do; for he who attempts everything he can do often attempts more than he can do.

Never believe all you may hear; for he who believes all that he hears often believes more than he hears.

Never lay out all you can afford; for he who lays out everything he can afford often lays out more than he can afford.

Never decide upon all you may see; for he who decides upon all that he sees often decides on more than he sees.

The difference between a young actor and an old critic is, one wants to get ahead while the other likes to hit a head.

INTERESTING CHURCH STATISTICS.

The last census bulletin gives the return of seven churches. This does not include the Roman Catholic, Greek Catholic, Russian Orthodox, Greek Orthodox, Armenian, Old Catholic, and Converted Reformed Catholic churches. The statistics concerning these will be published soon.

The Cumberland Presbyterian Church is presbyterian in polity, has a creed which is described as a via media between Calvinism and Arminianism, and owes its origin to a revival movement at the beginning of the present century.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has a hierarchical organization, and bases its faith chiefly on the Book of Mormon. It is divided into "stakes," and has apostles, bishops, elders, evangelists, etc.

The Reformed Episcopal Church was organized in 1873. It has no dioceses, but it has synods or episcopal jurisdictions.

The Moravian Church, officially called the Unitas Fratrum, is an episcopal body, consisting of three provinces, of which the churches in this country form one, those in England another, and those in Germany, where the church originated, or rather, was revived early in the eighteenth century, a third. It has bishops, but they are spiritual, not ecclesiastical, officers.

The German Evangelical Synod of North America celebrated October 12, 1890, the semi-centennial anniversary of its organization in this country. It accepts the symbolical books of the Lutheran and Reformed churches, representing in the United States the State Church of Prussia, which is a union of the Lutheran and Reformed bodies.

The German Evangelical Protestant Church is liberal in doctrinal belief, having no confession of faith. It is opposed to synodical organization, but its ministers are associated in Verein, or district unions. Some of its churches are older than the century.

The Brethren, as they wish to be known, represent a movement which began in 1830 in Plymouth, England, whence they are popularly designated Plymouth Brethren. There are three branches of them in this country. They have no ordained or paid ministry, and own no houses of worship. It is with extreme difficulty that information is obtained of the two branches not represented in this bulletin.

The largest body, as will be seen, is the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. It has 118 presbyteries, which are divided among eighteen synods, and it has 164,940 communicants. It is represented in twenty-two States, lying chiefly in the south and southwest. It has also congregations in the Indian Territory.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, though its chief strength lies in the territory of Utah, is also represented in nineteen States and two other Territories.

The territory of the Reformed Episcopal Church embraces twelve States, of which four belong to the South Atlantic, four to the North Atlantic, and four to the North Central division.

The Moravian Church has congregations in seventeen States and two Territories, including Alaska.

The German Evangelical Church is represented in twenty-two States, nearly half its strength being in Illinois, Missouri, and Ohio.

The churches of the German Evangelical Protestant Church are found chiefly in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Louisiana; they exist also in seven other States.

The congregations of the (Plymouth) Brethren are widely scattered, being found in twenty-seven States and the District of Columbia.

A glance at the statistics herewith presented will show that of the 2,791 organizations of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, 551, or about one-fifth, meet in halls, school-houses, and private houses. Of the 425 organizations of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 265 have edifices of their own, but 166, or more than one-third, meet in halls. Of the 83 organizations of the Reformed Episcopal Church only two meet in halls. The 94 organizations of the Moravian Church have 114 edifices, and only four meet in halls. Eighty-three of the 870 organizations of the German Evangelical Synod meet in halls. All the 52 organizations of the German Evangelical Protestant Church have edifices of their own, except one, which meets in a private house. All the organizations of the (Plymouth) Brethren meet in halls.

A Couple of General Grant's Army Stories.

It was in a field hospital within whose canvas walls many of our brave boys lay wounded and dying. Among them were two comrades who were more nearly like Damon and Pythias than any other two men I ever knew in real life. They had been born and bred in the same town, and enlisted at the same time, and had never been separated for a moment since they first donned Uncle Sam's blue uniform. I am sure that either would have gladly laid down his life for the other. They had both been slightly wounded before, the one having received a bayonet thrust in the left arm, and the other having had the index and middle fingers of his right hand shot away.

Now, as they lay side by side, however, their injuries were of a much more serious character. The surgeon looked very grave as he turned from one to the other, and the gravity of his expression deepened as he concluded his second examination. Then, as was his custom—for he held it a physician's duty to always inform a patient of the true state of his case—he told them plainly, but not without feeling, that they both had but a very few minutes to live. "All right," said one faintly but firmly, "we will die together, as I always hoped we would."

"I want to go if Tom goes," murmured the other. "Give me your hand, dear old boy," he continued, and he reached out his left hand toward his comrade.

The dying man grasped the extended hand, but finding it whole and unmaimed, he cast it from him saying, "No, no! not that hand! I want the one that was partly shot away on the battlefield."

His comrade extended his wounded hand, and Tom, his eyes fast glazing in death, clasped it and felt for the stumps of the missing fingers.

"This is the hand I want," he exclaimed, and raising it to his lips his spirit passed without a struggle. His friend, by a great exertion, raised his head and looked at his comrade. Seeing that he was no more, he uttered a loud cry, and the two friends were reunited.

There is no better, more fearless, or more loyal soldier than old Jack Dubbin, but he had one fault, and that was an overweening fondness for the whisky bottle, or rather for its contents. He had a boon companion whose real name I never knew, but everyone called him Uncle Si. While in camp old Jack was taken ill of a fever, and, despite the unremitting attentions of Uncle Si, died. The corpse developed an unusual rigidity, after death, and a strange tendency to fly up into a sitting posture. Accordingly, on the night before its burial it was stretched out at full length upon a board resting upon two wooden trestles, with its head and feet tied down by ropes.

Old Uncle Si insisted upon watching the remains of his dead friend. Shortly after midnight he became very thirsty, and stepped out to a neighboring sutler's to procure a drink. During his somewhat protracted absence two large cats found their way to the tent containing the remains of old Jack, and when Uncle Si returned he was naturally indignant at seeing these felines sitting on the corpse—one at the head, the other at the feet.

Seizing a billet of wood from the ground he aimed a powerful blow with it at the pussy sitting near the head. It missed its mark and struck and severed the rope holding down the head of the corpse, which immediately flew into a sitting posture. Seizing the dead man by the shoulders and forcing him back into a recumbent position, Uncle Si exclaimed in an aggravated tone: "Darn ye, old man, lie down and keep quiet. I'll attend to the cats."

Love and Genius.

Men of genius are popularly supposed to adore pretty little brainless simpletons. Fiction is apt to represent them as needing in a wife a sort of mental pillow—a restful vacuous mind, which will not weary their own great brains by demands on their thinking forces. That is the reason usually given when a man of marked mental power allies himself to a fool, as he sometimes does. The world regards these occasions with great satisfaction, for in its heart of hearts it esteems genius a kind of lunacy on which public opinion has set a premium, and finds it correct and proper that it should wed imbecility. But is a genius in love a pleasing object for the contemplation of his admirers? When Bulwer's love-letters were given to an amazed and nauseated reading public, and it perused with unquenchable laughter dozens of letters in which that great novelist addressed the object of his affection as "Itty doggy," and subscribed himself—to the extreme satisfaction of the reader—as "Puppy," our reverence for the man trembled on its foundations, and he seemed scarcely more a hero to us than he possibly did to his valet. Keat's letters to his sweetheart, Fanny Browne, while they rise at times to a mournful power, at other times are as common-place as the billet-doux of any college boy, while Fanny Browne herself did not seem to appreciate the distinction of being the lover of a poet. We are told she was "dark, sensuous and leopard-like." Perhaps the only pure and sincere passion that ever graced the stormy life of Byron was his boy-love for the beautiful Mary Chaworth, and there was said to be an element of dignity about it that checked the onlooker's inclination to treat it with the lightness usually accorded to the fancies of youth. Little is known of the young girl except that she was both lovely and brilliant. Many of Byron's poems are said to contain allusions to this early passion. Perhaps—who knows?—he was happier to have kept this simple romance intact, for he asks bitterly:

Think you if Laura had been Petrarch's wife,
He would have written sonnets all his life?

A man would do pretty poor fishing if he used a book-worm for bait.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Frequently when a funny man sings a comic song his face looks as if he were delivering a funeral oration.

Massenet has agreed to compose an opera for Harris, who, in collaboration with Muzzicato, will write the libretto, which is founded on Kenilworth.

Lillian Russell's pretty, artistic gowns, which she wears in "Apollo," were designed by herself. She studied pictures of Grecian dress and received suggestions from Alma Tadema.

Miss Eames, the American prima donna, had the honor of singing in Marlborough house on Sunday to a large family party. Signor Maurel also sang, and Signor Tosti accompanied them.

Theater goers may as well screw their courage up to the sticking place and brace themselves to face the ordeal. Eva Ray Hamilton has confirmed the report of her proposed raid on the stage.

A Philadelphia society girl, Miss Susanna Massey, has written a comedy of such merit that it is said Mr. Augustin Daly will produce it next season. It is called "The Merry Masqueraders." Miss Massey will spend the Summer in Europe.

A new cantata on the subject of "The Light of Asia" is to be produced as an opera in London next July, in the Italian language, with Miss Eames and M. Maurel in the cast. The composer of the music is Isadore de Lara. The Princess of Wales has interested herself in the production.

That American lady best known to all Americans as Mary Anderson, after achieving an altogether exceptional triumph upon the dramatic stage and winning the respect and admiration of her countrymen and of Englishmen, not alone by her talents, but by her character, chose to relinquish her profession at the very moment of her greatest success, and, laying down her laurels and her ambition, passed quietly into private life entirely of her own volition. In this and in many other respects the woman showed that although she was in the profession she was not of it. The hard, cold facts of the dramatic world show that this is an entirely exceptional case. The stage is an exacting and tyrannical mistress; indeed, art of any kind is; and once that the golden chains of success are fastened upon the actress she is unfitted in inclination, if not in character, for the performance of the soberer and higher duties of life away from the acclaim of the public and the publicity of the press. This is indeed the rule, and we have innumerable examples of players who have long outlived their public usefulness, but who still cling to the boards and are unable to exist, or at least to enjoy themselves, out of the glare and the glitter of an artificial condition. Miss Mary Anderson deliberately chose to leave the stage at the very moment when she was most successful upon it. It is only a just tribute to what we know of her character to say that this step was prompted by the conviction that it is indeed better to be than to seem to be, and was carried out in belief that a woman even with the most brilliant histrionic talents may find in the serene walks of life some higher duties than those imposed by the contemporaneous stage. It is not pleasant to note that the gossips of the coulisse lacked the chivalric good taste to let her alone when she ceased to be an object of public criticism. She escaped from the manager, but not from the paragrapher, who has informed the world regularly since her departure from the public vestibule of her personal discontents, her marital unhappiness and her restless desire to return to the footlights. These persistent pandects of the foyer at last called forth a modest but dignified protest from the lady herself, as noted in the World of last Sunday, who says "they are most unpleasant, rather malicious and altogether untrue. I am," she declares, "in perfect health, and although it is nearly a year since we were married, in that short space we have known more happiness than in the whole course of our lives. I am also happy in thinking I am done forever with the glare and publicity of the stage." This is the declaration of a married lady in private life begging to be let alone, and it is somewhat remarkable that the annoyances of the stage should follow her when she is fairly rid of its duties, and that she should have to bulletin her own content in order to neutralize the malice of others. Nothing can account for the fact except the existence of a vulgar and vicious notion that once an actress always public property. It is about time that decent journalism put its heel on that iniquity. All of us who understand how far superior a true woman is to a fine artist, seeing that one involves character and the other only ability, will never forget that in her brilliant passage from Kentucky to London—a passage that may be said to have been made on such laurels as few American artists have walked upon—she never once forgot her womanhood or stained her white robes with any of the grime of the playhouse.—Nym Crynkle.

Book Chat.

The college graduates are now preparing to leave their respective alma maters and step forth into the busy world. A good many of them will find it a much larger place than they had expected.

Miss Bessie Neater of Boston—Her books are simply delightful. Indeed, I think she is the most liberal writer I know of. Miss Hattie Bacon of Chicago—Well, I don't know. I don't think she is as liberal as Mrs. Southworth. Mrs. Southworth gives you 400 pages for a quarter every time.

The oldest printed book in Germany has been acquired by the Royal Library in Berlin. It is an early edition of the Chinese Art Treasury, Po-ku-t'u-lu, printed from metal blocks, and dating from the years 1308 to 1312. The impressions of both the text and the illustrations are said to be beautifully clear and distinct.

Mr. Connery's second novel, which he is now preparing for the printers, will be called "The American Prince," and is said to supply some entertaining chapters in the life of a well-known New Yorker. The true inwardness of a certain event in city politics, which caused much excitement and bitterness some years ago, is explained, and if all that is reported of it be true, "The American Prince" is likely to stir up a perfect hornet's nest.

There are but four college dailies in the world—the Harvard Crimson, Yale News, Cornell Sun, and U. of M. Daily. The Daily is published at Ann Arbor, at an expense of $2,000 a year. It is the cheapest of the four to the students, the subscription price being $2 50 per year, while the News is $4, the Crimson $3 50, and the Sun $3. There are about 180 issues of the Daily each year. The Crimson is 19 years old, the News 14, the Sun 11, and the Daily is just completing its first year. The managing editors spend about two and one-half hours a day in preparing the paper for the press.

Mrs. Abba Gould Woolson, of high Boston lineage and culture, wrote in her book on dress reform which Miss Louisa Alcott said contained more truth than any book she knew of except the Bible, as follows: "Why should woman, whose shape differs so little from that of her brother man, be expected to hide and confuse the contours of this common human form, as if they were a disgrace to her, and to her alone, and walk, and work, and live at perpetual disadvantage, because the wonderful mechanisms of the body, provided for her use in such work and such living, are clogged and weakened by masses of superimposed and useless drapery?"

Literature and art occupy an essential place in civilization. They are part and parcel of a liberal education. Yet they do not necessarily tend to promote morality. This is a fact familiar to every scholar. There should seem to be some truth in Lander's sneer that there is a spice of scoundrelism in most literary men. We all know, or know of, artists and literati who are more heathenish than the heathen, more Philistine than Goliath of Gath. In Athens the artistic and literary period was precisely that of the grossest moral degeneracy. Demosthenes thundered; but the people quailed and surrendered to Philip. They worshiped pictures and statues, poems and orations, and despised men and women. What is true of classic Greece is equally true of the Middle Ages. The dreariest midnight of immorality occurred when art and letters were most flourishing under the patronage of the Florentine Medici.

It is only when he brings in his bill, that the physician declares himself in favor of high heels.

Some women would rather be notorious than happy; strange to say, the men encourage them in this fad.

People pay two prices for the justice they get in the courts, and ten prices, with no end of compound interest, on cost for the justice which they try and fail to get by short and forcible cuts outside the law and the courts.

To the student the ministry still presents the surest and easiest way to a comfortable and highly respectable livelihood, and even worldly renown—looking at it from that point of view—as against the overcrowded callings that would otherwise be likely to attract him. Piety, ability and fitness are not taken into consideration.

It appears that Mr. Kyle, the reverend Indecrat who will represent South Dakota in the next session of the Senate, was sent out west by his church as a "missionary," on a stipend of $500 a year. The heathens of Dakota concluded that the east needs missionaries worse than the west, and sent him back again with ten times as large a salary.

"I had rather a remarkable experience while I was chaplain in the army," remarked one of the ministers at the pastors' union. "What was it?" "I had been working and talking to the boys about gambling, and they finally turned all the cards in the camp over to me. The next day they were paid off. The following day I was passing out, and saw a blanket spread out with two lumps of sugar on one corner, and about half the money in the camp spread out." "What were they doing?" "They were betting on which lump of sugar a fly would first light, and all the money on the blanket changed hands on the result." "What did you say to the boys?" "I said, 'Here, boys, come get your cards.'"

Once in camp, said Phil. Sheridan at a camp fire several years before his death, myself and some of my brother officers fell desperately in love with a female voice we used to hear singing at night. It was simply angelic, and resolved to see the singer we followed its sound through thickets and ravines till we came to a lonely cabin whence the singing proceeded. Creeping up to the window I peered in and beheld a fat, greasy, middle-aged negress, barefooted and clad in a single garment of dirty calico, browning coffee with a long iron spoon, while she gave vent to the sweetest notes I had ever heard. In my surprise I staggered forward with a noise that attracted her attention. Grasping her coffee skillet and waving it around her head, she bawled out: "G'way from dah, white man. Ef yo' don't, I'll frow dis yeah fryin' pan right at yo' head."

Daniel Webster, when a small boy, was very careless, not to say untidy, in the matter of personal cleanliness. His teacher had many times reproved him for not washing his hands. He had both coaxed and scolded him, but it was to no purpose—Daniel would come to school with dirty hands. One day, out of all patience with him, he called Daniel to his desk, made him hold up his hands in the presence of the whole school, and solemnly warned him, that if he ever came to school again with his hands in that condition he would give him a flogging that he would long remember. Daniel promised better behavior, and for a while there was a great improvement. His reformation, however, did not prove to be permanent, his hands being in a few days as dirty as ever. The teacher's eyes detected them, and as soon as school had opened for the day, with a loud voice he said, "Daniel, come here!" Daniel stealthily brought the palm of his right hand into contact with his tongue, and as he walked slowly toward the teacher, rubbed it upon his trousers in the effort to remove from it some of the dirt. "Hold out your hand!" said the teacher. Daniel extended his right hand, palm upward. "Do you call that a clean hand?" sternly demanded the teacher. "Not very, sir," modestly replied Daniel. "I should say 'not very!'" said the teacher. "I promised you a flogging, but I will let you off this time, if in this whole school-room you will show me a dirtier hand than that." "There it is, sir," exclaimed Daniel, quickly extending his left hand, which had not undergone the summary cleansing of the right.

The Island of the Seven-Headed Devil.

The little island of Pootoo, about 150 miles from Shanghai and forty from Ningpo, is a beautiful little dot in the China Sea, some four miles square, and is sacred to the worship of Buddha. Being a sacred island, Pootoo has its temple, and the temple has its idol, a monster figure hammered from pure gold, holding a cornucopia filled with bamboo sticks. A devil with seven red heads, each provided with seven mouths filled with blue teeth and white tongues, is said to have once threatened the Chinese and their Buddhist institutions. He came by way of the China Sea, and the people prepared to defend themselves and their religion. Although floating on the crest of the waves forty miles out from Ningpo, the awful red heads and blue teeth of the devil were plainly visible night and day to those on land. The priests implored Buddha and the common people passed sleepless nights. Finally an old mandarin bethought himself of a plan to rid the country of the impending calamity. He went to the spot where Buddha had been seen to kneel and pray. Removing the turf, he delved in the clay with a sacred knife and made a round ball and fashioned the image of Buddha's face on one of its sides. With this peculiar relic carefully wrapped in a turban of yellow silk he joined the grief-stricken throng at the seashore. Again imploring Buddha for divine assistance, he hurled the sacred clay with might and main at the many-headed demon in the sea. As the ball receded from the shore it seemed to grow in size; so also did the red-headed, blue-toothed devil. But the ball enlarged much more rapidly than the imp of his Satanic Majesty, and finally dropped prone upon the horrid creature. With a howl of baffled rage and pain the devil sunk beneath the weight of the ball, but not until he had given it one furious lash with his spiked tail. The ball of sacred clay continued to grow, and is now the island of Pootoo; a great gorge through its center marking the spot where the furious devil lashed it in his dying rage. Chinese tradition says that in his last struggles the devil loosened several of his scales, which were eventually washed upon the sacred island and used in laying the foundation of the temple above mentioned. The cornucopia in the arms of the golden idol now in the temple is made from one of the blue teeth of the monster.

NOTES.

Money cannot improve a mean man. It may have the effect of admitting him into so-called good society, however.

Hot water is one of the best among simple remedies. For instance, headache almost always yields to the simultaneous application of hot water to the feet and back of the neck.

Every virtue gives a man a degree of felicity in some kind; honesty, a good report, justice, estimation; prudence, respect; courtesy and liberality, affection; temperance, good health; fortitude, a quiet mind.

They have a law in Boston that if a man loses money at gambling and does not make demand for it within three months anybody may seek to recover three times the amount so lost from the winner. A case is on now based on this law.

Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes believes that the body and mind are both affected by the character of food consumed. "An exclusively pork diet gives a bristly character to the beard and hair," and too much food from the sea gives the shine and motions of a fish.

A preacher over in Illinois has been discovered making counterfeit money because his salary was so small he could not live on it. This is probably the only case of this kind on record, but there have doubtless been many instances where desperate measures would be justifiable.

Mr. Gladstone is strongly in favor of admitting women to the board of county councilors, and his answer to the deputation proposing the bill was extremely lucid and straightforward. He had gathered that in county-council work there was a field for women's energies and a real want for them to supply, and he heartily indorsed the bill.

Franklin is credited with the statement that the flesh of a goose killed by an electric current is particularly fine eating. This brings up interesting possibilities in the culinary art and shows the far-reaching nature of the electrician's science. An electric current will replace the boarding-house axe and tough steaks will become a thing of the past.

The Massachusetts House has passed a bill repealing the much-talked of food and drink law of that State, which was expected to promote temperance by the requirement that no liquor should be sold over the bar, but that the drinker must be seated and food served. The law was, of course, evaded and made ridiculous. It is doubtful whether it accomplished any good.

The national spirit of unrest in Russia appears to have spread even to the peasants, who have been considered hitherto as hardened by custom to the endurance of tyranny. But mere repression is never a remedy for political and social evils, and the crater upon which the Russian government have been sitting so long bids fair to break forth into a state of active eruption almost any day.

Mr. Grundy is a name often heard in the half-playful, half-satirical question, "What will Mrs. Grundy say?" Her name stands for the neighborhood, the society, in which one moves. This particular Mrs. Grundy was the wife of Farmer Grundy, in Morton's "Speed the Plough," a comedy first presented in 1798. Dame Ashfield, wife of another farmer, is jealous of her neighbor, and forever wondering "What will Mrs. Grundy say?"

The Queen Regent of Spain is a very devoted mother, and lives as quietly as any of her most humble subjects, bathing with the little King and Princesses in the morning, and driving or sailing with them in the afternoon. The baby King asserts his prerogative full royally even now, to the despair of his governess, who cannot persuade him to conform to the conventionalities of life, or to address his titled subjects by other than their Christian names.

The following is to be found in Bellamy's "Looking Backward." It is very appropriate, and might well be read with profit at the present time by the interested: "I cannot sufficiently celebrate the glorious liberty that reigns in the public libraries of the twentieth century as compared with the intolerable management of those of the nineteenth century, in which the books were jealously railed away from the people, and obtainable only at an expenditure of time and red tape calculated to discourage any ordinary taste for literature."

According to the terms of a new law in New York, "any person who shall by any offensive or disorderly act or language annoy or interfere with any person or persons in any place or with the passengers of any public stage, railroad car, ferryboat or other public conveyance, or who shall disturb or offend the occupants of such stage, car, boat or conveyance by any disorderly act, language or display, although such act, conduct or display may not amount to an assault or battery, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor." This is very well as far as it goes; but the boor may still cross his legs and dust his shoes upon the skirts of passing ladies; and madame may sit edgewise so as to occupy two seats while she pays for but one. It is a swift lawmaker who can keep track of social lawlessness on board cars, boats and stages.

There is a very familiar maxim which directs us to "do one thing at a time," and it applies to our eating duty as much as to any other. For, although light reading, requiring little thought, may not do much harm, yet, as a rule, all brain labor withdraws blood from the stomach and affects the secretion of the digestive juices, so bringing on indigestion. Violent emotions put an immediate stop to the digestive process and suspend the salivary secretion. Commercial and literary men have often complained of attacks of vomiting when they took their dinner alone and allowed the mind to dwell deeply on some absorbing subject, and yet they could dine out and eat and drink all sorts of rich things with impunity. When the stomach is full the less the mind has to do the better.

If you ever observe it, the electric light is responsible for many grotesqueries nightly painted on respectable walls and matter-of-fact sidewalks. Shadows are only shadows, but they give one the shivers sometimes, especially at a late hour, when honest folk are supposed to be in bed. Giants of despair then stretch out long arms at the corners of silent streets, and strange profiles are thrown against the unconscious houses, and weird traceries of dancing branches make the pavement rise and fall in a style that must puzzle a person who knows he is sober. Alone, without the presence of humanity, these electric shadows lend the sleeping city a mystic animation that even conventional moonshine fails to dispel. The sputter, the swish of the lights, too, add to the uncanny effect, and their fluctuations would, in time, drive the sane mad if thought was taken of them. Luckily, man can accustom himself to almost anything.

All influences that promote selfishness, intolerance, and a love of vice and immorality, or that take from life its great and noble purposes, and encourage a butterfly existence, are essentially demoralizing, and destructive to the proper growth of man's higher nature. When we measure a life by the work it accomplishes in ameliorating the sufferings, elevating the impulses, and brightening the existence of the toiling and struggling brotherhood of man; in creating an ideal home where the soul is cultured, where the fruits of the spirit ripen into the richest maturity; where the flowers of truth, clarity, and gentleness send forth their fragrance on every hand; where day by day man advances nearer and nearer the great throbbing soul of Infinity, while his heart expands and becomes more Godlike at every step that is taken—we say, measured by this standard (and only by this can we regard life worth living), many whose names are great, and whose fame hangs on the lips of ten thousands, are only skeletons, fleshless, soulless, and lifeless, while thousands whose names the mad world little notes, are in truth grandly great.

Some cynic has said that "a woman is at the top or bottom of everything either good or bad." To those who accept this estimate of all pervading qualities of the tender sex, it will be no surprise to learn that the baccarat scandal, now convulsing English society, had its origin in jealousy about a woman. As the story goes, Lady Brooke, whose name has for some time been coupled with that of the Prince of Wales as his "favorite," saw fit to smile upon Gordon Cumming, and that the Prince, in order to "get even" with his rival, made public the charge of cheating at cards preferred against Cumming by some of those in the party upon that eventful night. The explanation as to the affair makes two things quite apparent. One is, that a noble name, assured position, and all the concomitants of the very highest of high life does not eliminate the baser passions; and the second is, that gilded society is about on a par with any other society the world over. Should the sensational developments but serve to tone down the erratic course of "Grandfather" Wales, who is old enough to keep better company, the baccarat scandal will not be an unmixed evil.

Don't listen to it, girls. It may be very amusing, it may cause you to laugh, but when you remember it afterward a blush will certainly come, not only over your face, but in your heart. Listening to stories the wording and meaning of which are not nice is the first step toward making a woman coarse and vulgar.

Good Man (sadly)—Ah, my son, you have been to the circus; it pains me greatly to think that one so young should have crossed the threshold of iniquity. Bad Small Boy—I didn't cross no threshold; I crawled in under the tent.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

"The Limited Mail" was given last night to a good house. There are some fine sensational acts in the play. To-night the drama will be repeated.

Katie Emmet, in "The Waifs of New York," is booked for June 22 and 23. This is one of the popular sensational dramas of the day. The company is said to be strong.

If there could be anything worse than the Sullivan combination, it has never been brought to our notice. The alleged play and alleged actors were individually and collectively absolutely void of merit. Such travesties are but the prostitution of the stage.

J. J. McClosky, an old-time California actor, has been recounting some reminiscences of the days of gold, when he and Edwin Booth were associates on the stage in '49 and '50. In a chat with a New York reporter, McClosky, who is a member of the Society of California Pioneers in New York, produced a souvenir in an old play bill of December 10, 1850. The play was "Marble Heart," or "The Sculptor's Dream," and was performed at the Sacramento Theater, December 10, 1850. The cast was as follows:

Phidias.....(the Sculptor).....	Mr. Edwin Booth
Gorgias.....(a Rich Citizen of Athens).....	Mr. J. J. McClosky
Alcibiades.....(the General).....	Mr. C. Rogers
Diogenes.....(the Philosopher).....	Mr. Henry Sedley
Strabon.....(a Slave).....	Mr. McCabe
Thea.....(a Slave).....	Miss Sopia Edwin
Aspasia.....	Mrs. C. W. Sinclair
Lais.....(the Statues).....	Mrs. George Chapman
Phryne.....	Miss Adelaide
Athenians.....Messrs. Reeves, Griffiths, Long, Vincent, etc., etc.

J. J. McClosky is remembered by "49ers," and was often seen on the stage in early days at Stockton, Sacramento and San Francisco. One of the incidents of the early stage is given thus:

"One night we were playing 'Hamlet' in the Downieville Theater, which was built over a 'drift.' Murdock was Hamlet, and just as he picked up the skull of Yorick, after the First Gravedigger had left the grave, a slouch-hatted, red-shirted miner appeared in the hole. He was the foremost of the night-shift men, and in following the 'lead' had come across the grave. His astonishment, as well as Murdock's, can well be imagined, and a lively and acrimonious debate ensued between Hamlet and the miner, the latter refusing to go down until Pritchard, the owner of the theater, who was in the audience, yelled out, with his pistol aimed at the miner's head:

"Hey, you, Bill Mills, get down out o' there, or I'll bore a hole in yer!"

"Bill Mills then disappeared, and the play went on. Booth simply roared at this incident not down in Shakespeare's play."

Brilliant Social Event.

Few young couples set out on life's matrimonial voyage under such radiance as that attending Dwight Henry Miller and Celia May Simmons. The scenes surrounding the nuptials were suggestive of Arabian Nights tales. The ceremony and reception was given at the elegant residence of the bride's father, Dr. G. L. Simmons, and nothing was left undone to render the occasion memorable. The young bride and groom did, indeed, appear to be under a spell of enchantment. The enchantment of eternal love was there—the mutual love of each other—and the great devout love of the parents certainly made up the enchanted scene. Add to this the adoration of the multitude of friends, and the fairy picture is complete. If this couple were not mated, then none were ever mated before. They were born and raised in this city, and have known each other from infancy. Fortune has been kind to each, and while their pathway has been smooth, they have realized that they must sooner or later depend upon their own resources. The youthful groom is educated and trained for a business career, and the intellectual young bride has the accomplishments as well as the training to fit her for the great battle of life. The sterling and practical example of their respective parents is a sufficient guarantee that the true lessons of life will not be lost on the youthful couple. The wedding gifts were numerous, and little is left to be added to commence housekeeping on a large scale. The reception was indeed a magnificent affair, and attended by legions of the friends of both families. The fairies have thrown their jeweled slippers after this happy young couple. Dr. Simmons has lost a daughter, but gained a son. Frank Miller has gained a daughter.

Rev. Carroll M. Davis.

That Rev. Carroll M. Davis has returned to Sacramento, though temporarily, is of gratification to his very many friends. That he cannot permanently abide with us is of regret. It is gratifying, however, that so young a man should have been called to the important station in the field he now occupies—St. Louis. The views of Rev. Davis are liberal and progressive; that more others with his ideas would be in the ministry would be of benefit to the cause of Christianity.

FLASHES.

Culture is not morality, by any means.

Some women are not as bad as they are painted.

A kind word and smile is often fine stock in trade.

A girl may be vain, but then she is not made-in vain.

Never fool with an electric wire, or red-headed woman.

Always refuse what you can't get. This is a motto in politics.

A round of pleasure is fine, but it is difficult to square up after.

A fellow will trip over a straw in doing good, but climb over mountains to get into mischief.

The party leaders are always agreed on one thing—they all want to hold or control the offices.

A young liar always develops into an old one. Calumny would soon starve out if there was no place for it to lodge.

We congratulate the jokers of the country press upon their self-control in so far suppressing the remark that it is about time for the mosquito to send in his bill.

Replying to the question, "When is a man too smart?" we have to say that he is always too smart when he imagines that all of his fellow mortals are jackasses, and that the earth is his livery stable.

The First Celestial Charts.

Aniximander of Miletus is said to have been the inventor of celestial charts about 570 B. C. This may be the earliest record of a map of the heavens, but considering the antiquity of astrology and astronomy it is difficult to understand that celestial maps or diagrams were not in existence long prior to this date. The heavenly houses laid out by the astrologers of old to foretell the fortunes of their clients must have been charts of some parts of the heavens. As a fact, the Chinese are known to have understood astronomy so far back as 2857 B. C., and the Hindus about 3102 B. C., irrespective of the Chaldeans, Egyptians and ancient Greeks. The Alexandrian school of philosophy, which flourished about 200 B. C., was the first to commence a regular system of observation. It was not till then that the paths of the planets in the orbits were determined, the relative positions of the fixed stars clearly laid down and the constellations or clusters of stars in various regions of the heavens, that had been grouped together and denoted by fanciful beasts and birds and human beings, duly mapped out and catalogued.

The Toad Grew Up With the Tree.

While a huge pine log was being sawed into lumber at a saw mill on a small creek some two miles from Athens, as the workmen were turning it over preparatory to squaring it, what was their astonishment to see the head of a huge frog bob out, where he was embedded and barely escaped being cut by the saw. How in the world his toadship got there is a mystery, as he was completely incased without any possible means of ingress or egress. As the log was the fourth or fifth from the butt of the tree, the frog must have had his apartment some fifty or sixty feet from the ground. The tree was perfectly sound with the exception of a decayed spot some inches below the hermetically sealed prison of the frog. The animal was very fat and was unable to move when pulled out of his den, and he was taken in hand by one of the negroes who discovered him in his singular domicile.—Albany News.

Trees of the palm family have larger leaves than others. The inaja palm, which grows on the banks of the Amazon, has leaves which reach a length of from thirty to fifty feet and are ten or twelve feet in breadth. Specimens of the leaves of the talipot palm, a native of Ceylon, have been met with that were twenty feet long and eighteen feet broad. These leaves are used by the natives to make tents and form very efficient shelters from the rain. The leaves of the double coconut palm are often thirty feet long and several feet wide. When the wind is strong they clash together with a noise that may be heard a great distance. Only one leaf is produced each year, and they are so firmly attached to the stem of the tree and so strong in themselves that a man may sit on the end of one of them and rock to and fro in perfect safety.

A gentleman heard a young visitor in his house ask his own son, aged six: "Which would you rather be, a walking policeman or a mounted policeman?" "A mounted policeman, of course," said the boy. "Why?" asked the other. "Cause, if the robbers came I could get away quicker!"

Six pairs of breeches, each pair warranted to be those worn by Nelson at the battle of Trafalgar, have been offered for show at the Royal Naval Exhibition.

TWO BRAVE "COWARDS."

The Famous Duel Between General Johnston and General Huston.

One of the bravest men that ever lived was Felix Huston, of Texas, who, in 1836, commanded the army in the field of the Lone Star State. Probably his nearest counterpart since was General Joe Hooker. Huston was as oratorically magnetic and passionate as Patrick Henry, E. D. Baker, or Thomas Starr King; as intrepid as Custer, Sheridan, or Kilpatrick, and as fond of wine and women as Luther, Magruder, or Van Dorn. And, while he was truly a tactician, discipline with this rollicking Hotspur was a lost or an unknown art.

About this time Albert Sidney Johnston was Adjutant General of the army of the Republic of Texas, during the administration of President Sam Houston. This was subsequent to the battle of San Jacinto, and the Texans were encamped on that territory lying between Galveston Island and Indianola. Thomas J. Morgan and George W. Morgan, of Ohio, who were Colonels of Ohio regiments during the Mexican war, and who were general officers during the rebellion upon the Federal side, were officers in the army of the Lone Star State in 1836! The latter is now living at Mount Vernon, Ohio.

One day in November, 1836, Albert Sidney Johnston was directed to assume command of the Texan army, much to his own surprise, and much against his wish. Indeed, he called at once upon President Houston and stated that he would greatly prefer to remain undisturbed, and incidentally declared that the heroic army of the Texas Republic would be the loser thereby. But Houston and Congress had decided to place Johnston in command, and to accept the resignation of the gallant Huston if necessary. Huston at once turned over his command to Johnston, and, upon meeting his successor, raised his cap and extending his hand pleasantly, and otherwise exhibited evidences of real or seeming friendship, all of which was cordially and courteously accepted.

Upon the following evening Huston invited Johnston and his staff to supper, which was as fine as could be given, and wines, cigars, mirth and melody made the time pass merrily until the so-called witching hour, when Johnston and his staff took their leave. In exactly twenty minutes afterward, however, Major Izzard, of Huston's staff, called at Johnston's quarters and presented the following note:

"General Huston has the honor to present his compliments to General Johnston, and begs to assure him that there is no man in the Republic of Texas under whom he would be more proud to serve; but that the President and Congress had put upon him an insult; and as he could not demand that satisfaction of the President and Congress as he would wish, he had the honor to request that General Johnston, as their representative, would state when it would be convenient for him to meet General Huston on the field of honor; and that Major Izzard was authorized to return with a reply."

In proportion to its population no section of country on earth contained so many able, ambitious, gallant, and chivalrous men as the Republic of Texas at that time. And, of course, dueling—or, rather, the code of the duello—was a high and honored custom, if not, indeed, the law of that land, and many of the best men of the famous new republic had fallen victims to its stern requirements. Therefore, Johnston had only one thing to do—accept Huston's mean, unchivalrous, uncalled for challenge. True, he had given his predecessor no earthly offense. On the contrary, he had accepted his invitation to join him at a well-served repast, and made merry with his host until midnight, and each had wished the other well at parting. Still, the requirements of polished barbarism, or the fear of being "posted," compelled a brave, good man to weaken for the first and only time, and he replied as follows:

"Gen. Johnston reciprocates the sentiments so kindly expressed by Gen. Huston, and begs to inform him through Col. Morehouse that it will afford the General commanding pleasure to meet Gen. Huston on the west bank of La Baca on the following morning, at a point to be determined by their respective friends."

"This is an outrage," said Col. Morehouse to Maj. Izzard.

"I know it," responded the latter.

"Gen. Johnston never pulled a hair trigger in his life, while Gen. Huston can put a pistol ball into a dollar thrown into the air. Gen. Johnston is inviting murder!"

"Sir!"

"Yes, sir; I mean what I say. But he is a splendid shot with a rifle, and I shall advise him to use that weapon."

"The rifle is not allowed by the code, Col. Morehouse."

"I believe you are right," responded the Colonel, "but it is unfortunate that the only brace of dueling pistols in camp is owned by Gen. Huston."

This was true, and it was the opinion of all that Johnston would not select rifles as weapons, as he was the soul of honor, and would rather surrender his life than take the very advantage that his rival, in a state of great mortification, might willingly use over him. The only pocket case of instruments in camp was owned by Assistant Surgeon Coates, and this case was borrowed at about five in the morning by Medical Examiner Ezra Reed on the pretext that a soldier had mashed a finger.

But "Bang!" "Bang!" was heard an hour later, and the whole camp was abreast for the river, shouting: "Johnston and Huston are fighting."

And so they were, on the west side of the river.

At the first fire the ball from Johnston's weapon cut a twig from a tree, which fell at Huston's feet, while the ball from Huston's pistol went through the lappel of his opponent's coat. Huston picked up the twig and said:

"That was a capital shot, General."

"So was this," serenely responded Johnston, running his thumb through the hole of his coat; "much better than mine, I apprehend."

"You shall have another chance, then, General."

"All right, my friend, if it is strictly agreeable to you. Gentlemen, load again."

The principals again fired, Huston's missile going no one knows where, and Johnston's hitting the ground a few feet in front of his antagonist, and scattering some dirt on the clothes of the latter. At the third shot Johnston missed, and the flint of Huston's pistol failed to fire in consequence of the weakness of the spring, at which Huston sat down at the foot of a tree and braced the spring with a wedge. They then fired again, and Johnston was shot through the hip and fell, as if dead. But he at once raised himself on his elbow and said:

"Gentlemen, I had no grievance against Gen. Huston whatever, and I call upon you all to bear witness that this meeting has been conducted according to the laws of honor."

Gen. Johnston was then lifted up tenderly by Col. Morehouse and Dr. Reed and borne from the field, and although he suffered a great deal physically, it was nothing compared to the remorse that Huston carried with him to his death-bed, for there was no earthly cause for the challenge, as Johnston had done him no wrong. Further, the challenged man might have chosen rifles, and was strongly urged to do so by Col. Morehouse, but declined because he was an expert shot with that weapon.

In speaking of the duel some time afterward, Huston said to Gen. John H. King, who commanded the regulars in the Atlanta campaign, and who lately died in Washington of pneumonia:

"There are two kinds of cowards in this world—the brave coward is one of them. In our duel in 1836 Albert Sidney Johnston was one and so was I. I knew he had put upon me no wrong, and out of respect for me he had assumed the command of the army with reluctance. I had no more right to challenge him to mortal combat than I have you. It was a shameful piece of business, and I wouldn't do it again under any circumstances. I was what may be termed a brave coward, if I may coin the name. And so was Johnston in accepting the challenge. I have reproached myself many times for my attitude. I invited him to supper, treated him cordially, and in half an hour afterward challenged him to mortal combat. And he not only accepted it, but named 6 o'clock the following morning as the hour of meeting, and selected pistols instead of guns. Why, when I reflect upon the circumstance I hate myself, for the General was an expert with a rifle, but didn't know a dueling pistol from a sailor's knot. I owned the only dueling pistols in camp, and could hit the ace of diamonds at dueling distance at the drop of a handkerchief. And I kept setting him up until I hit him. Why, that one act blackened all the good ones of my life. But I couldn't challenge Congress, and President Houston, although a duelist, was too far ahead of me in rank. Well, thank God, I didn't kill him. And, mark my word, Lieut. King, some day, if occasion requires it, Albert Sidney Johnston will display a gallantry that may possibly carry him to his grave!"

The writer once met Albert Sidney Johnston in Utah, nearly thirty-five years ago, and was greatly fascinated by him. He looked every inch a soldier. He stood at least 6 feet 2 inches, was massive in proportion, but possessed no superfluity of flesh. As he remembers him there was the most perfect symmetry in his physique, and in his face and manner there was a combination of elegance, serenity, dignity and benignity that made him at once august, winning and heroic. He was killed at Shiloh at 11:30 o'clock on Sunday, April 6, 1862, while seated on a magnificent gray horse, in full uniform, leading his army through as dreadful carnage as has ever been seen on any field of battle. The historian of the future will pay him no small tribute. His whole career will be chronicled by unimpassioned writers after the turbulent and prejudiced ones are gone, and probably no character upon either our own or the Confederate side will stand out more luminous, chivalrous or sublime than that of Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston.

Last July I was a guest at the house of his son, Hancock Johnston, who owns a beautiful ranch near San Jacinto, San Diego county, Cal. Hancock Johnston is about 45 years old, and has thousands of fine horses, sheep and goats, while his "cattle feed upon a thousand hills." He has a lovely wife and a number of handsome grown-up children. His latch-string is always out, and he has a happy way of making one feel, while partaking of his hospitality, that he is monarch of all he surveys. Mr. Johnston has mountains of game and forests of song-birds and streamlets of fish all around him, and blue skies above him 350 out of 365 days of the year.

I have known him intimately but twenty-four years, and I cannot resist saying that he has one of the prettiest places on the face of the earth, and that, happy as he is with his family and surroundings, he is never so happy as when there are guests in the house. Fruits and vegetables grow the year round. Probably there is no night that the windows and doors are not all open, and there are servants and Jerseys and horses and peacocks and turkeys and good cheer at all times, and when I say that Mrs. Johnston, who was a Miss Eaton, of Virginia, can take a Winchester and shoot a butterfly on the wing, I do not exaggerate in the least. Indeed, there are a great many ladies in Southern California who can converse with you in Spanish and French, and who sing and play and paint, but who can also kill a quail or a deer from the top of a moving coach and whip out fifty pounds of trout in half a day.—N. Y. Times.

What a Daughter Costs.

Since the accumulation of large fortunes in this country, and notably in New York, and the establishment of a moneyed aristocracy, one of the greatest problems presented to rich parents is the marrying of their daughters. To the father it is as much concern as his affairs in stocks, and to the mother it is a matter of daily care. The daughter is no sooner born than her future becomes a subject for reflection. In a few weeks it is known whether she will be plain or pretty. If she is plain that means the expenditure of a good-sized fortune to take her after years to the bridal altar. If she is pretty the parents are jubilant, for her future can pretty well take care of itself.

Wealthy New York parents make it a point of surrounding their daughters with all the form and luxury that fall to the lot of a princess. They are not willing when their daughter goes to boarding-school that she live in a neat, plain room like the conventional quarters assigned to young ladies in olden times in English boarding-schools and French pensions, but they must surround her with every display that the modern institution will tolerate. Her room is a boudoir of Oriental luxury. Entering it, you sink to the ankles in Persian, Smyrna, and every description of Turkish rugs, in colors Tyre could not rival; the walls are hung with beautiful tapestries with chaste Dianas upon them; there is a divan with great elder-down pillows, and made savagely luxurious by a tiger skin thrown carelessly across it to give the gilded maiden rest when she comes wearied from the street or the class-room. There are Turkish or Chinese slippers, cool and soft to her feet; Oriental wrappers of the softest and costliest stuffs, and the loveliest of colors; a dressing-case studded with everything dear to a girl's heart, not the least of which are perfumes costing from 50 cents an ounce to $1 a drop. In her wardrobe are her hand-embroidered night dresses of silk as soft as down and beautifully designed; and her white iron bed, with brass knobs, is made so inviting with its Marseilles or quilted India silk coverlid in summer, its elder-down spreads in winter, the hanging cherub above and the hangings, with their beautiful hand-painted designs, that it might tempt Saint Agnes herself to come and lie there. But what money it all costs!

When she reaches her eighteenth year she graduates from the boarding-school, and is, perhaps, sent to a finishing school, where she becomes a parlor boarder surrounded with her usual luxury, and gets finishing touches on deportment. All this, it must be borne in mind, is a preparation for the matrimonial market. Then my young lady goes home and the real expenses commence.

If she is a very plain girl she must have every accomplishment that money can give her. She must learn to draw and to paint on silk and china, for European princesses have lately made this fashionable. A select dancing master is engaged to give her private lessons, for that is supposed to make her more graceful in her movements.

Every rich man's daughter in New York learns to ride; and if it is the intention to send her to England, she must learn to ride "cross country," so she joins a private hunt club, and follows the hounds on the trail of the anise seed. Then she must have an expert French teacher one day in the week for conversation, and a German teacher for the same purpose another day. The knowledge of the music she acquired at the boarding-school is not considered sufficient, so she is at once put under the care of a pale, mild gentleman, with fierce hair and many diplomas, who brings Wagner into her life; to which is added the offices of some melancholy and extinct Italian nobleman, who teaches her the guitar. It is also considered an accomplishment to be able to fence; so to the fencing master she goes, and she varies this exercise by attending at a gymnasium, where she develops her muscles. Of course, if she is pretty all this is not necessary.

She makes many other calls on her father's pocketbook. She must formally come out. She must now have dresses made by Worth or Felix, and pay as high as $500 for the making of one of these. If no family jewels have descended to her, she must have diamonds, pearls, and other precious stones, and her equipment must compare with girls already out. When bills for the ball are paid, then comes the allowance for pin money, out of which she has to assist several fashionable charities. She appears at grand opera at least one evening in the week, at theater another, and she can sit only in a box; then come flowers, bouillons, and the latest perfumes. The manicure comes regularly to beautify her hands and nails, and the chiropodist to tend her feet. Her maid she has always with her; a companion, if she has no sisters, and frequently a paid chaperon at the telephone waiting to be called.

Although it may seem strange, it is true, that the richer a New Yorker is, the more wealth does he look for in the man who is to marry his daughter. He and his wife make it a point to keep the daughter as far as possible from making the acquaintance of young men who are not rich. They will not permit her to visit houses where she is likely to make such acquaintances, and they constantly impress upon her that an admirer without money is altogether below her station, and not to be dreamt of. Unless she is romantic she comes to look upon young men as articles of merchandise, and falls entirely into line with her parents.

The hare has the power of seeing objects in its rear in a marked degree. Its eyes are large, prominent and placed laterally. Its power of seeing in the rear is very noticeable in greyhound coursing, for though this dog is mute while running, the hare is able to judge to a nicety the exact moment at which it will be best to double. Horses furnish another instance. It is only necessary to watch a horse driven invariably without blinders, to prove this. Take, for instance, those on street railroads. Let the driver even attempt to take the whip in hand, and if the horse is used to the work he will at once increase his pace. The giraffe, which is a very timid animal, is approached with the utmost difficulty, on account of its eyes being so placed that it can see as well behind as in front. When approached, this same faculty enables it to direct with great precision the rapid storm of kicks with which it defends itself.

A BATTLE WITHIN A BATTLE.

Our battery had been doing splendid service.

From our position on the right we could see the shells drop into the woods and break up the formation of the Confederate cavalry every time they left cover.

We knew where they were. Jeb Stuart's old troopers were there. Wade Hampton's dragoons were there. Fitz Lee's hard fighters were there—Imboden, Rosser, Mosby—every Confederate cavalry command we had fought in Virginia was making ready in the shelter of the woods to charge on our left flank.

Boom! boom! boom!
The gunners knew what was at stake. The orders were to die at the guns if the position could not be held. For half an hour their bursting shells kept the front clear, and we of the cavalry cheered them.
"What's that?"

Out from the cover of the forest at half a dozen places gallop the gray troopers by hundreds. They wheel to the right and left, form in two lines, take their distance, close up with a trembling motion, and now there will be a grand charge. The shells burst in front of them, over them, among them, but discipline is stronger than the fear of death.

Less than three hundred of us—all cavalry—to support the battery! If that mob of gray riders ever reaches the foot of the slope we shall be picked up and sent whirling like dry leaves in a hurricane. The fire of the six guns becomes more rapid—it is truly terrific; but in their haste the gunners do less execution.

"Left wheel—forward—half-right dress!"
Just 278 of us by actual count, as we dress in two ranks. What are we going to do?

"Draw sabres—forward—trot—gallop—charge!"

They are driving us down at that body of men—ten times our number—to break and check the charge. If we can stop them for ten minutes the battery will be saved by the infantry. We oblique to the left as we go to close up. We are a living wedge, driving down to enter a living mass and split it in twain.

Afraid? No! There is an exultation—a sort of drunkenness—about it which drowns all fear. It's taking awful chances—odds of a hundred to one—but there comes a species of insane delight when one figures such desperate odds. They are coming at a gallop—we are charging with full speed. Every carbine is slung to its owner's back; the sabre is to settle this. They are yelling as they come; we "yi! yi! yi!" in reply.

Can the wedge enter? Is the impetus strong enough to break a way into the solid wall of living men and horses? I look along their line as the distance decreases with fearful rapidity, and I realize that the shock will be tremendous.

Here it comes! Brace for it! Shut your teeth hard—grip with your knees—mind your stirrups! Crash—smash—whirl—dust—smoke!

The wedge enters! The wedge drives ahead over fallen horses and dismounted riders—yellings, slashing, cutting—keeping its pace. A trooper slashes at me—a horse goes down in front of mine—I feel myself falling with my horse, and then I am out of the fight for a moment.

The darkness which enshrouded things passes away after a bit, and I find my horse lying across my feet, with the saddle flap so holding them that his dead body must be lifted up to get me clear.

The charge of the gray troopers was broken. That wedge drove right through the mass and turned to attack them in rear. Swirling about in circles like the Vulture of War, the mass of men edges away until the field around me is clear of all but dead and wounded. I've got a sabre cut on the shoulder, and can feel the warm blood bathing my arm, but I know I could walk away if I could get my feet clear. I am working to extricate them, when I hear hoof-beats behind me, and next moment a riderless horse dashes up and comes to a halt.

Ah! but how the glory of battle excites a horse! See how red his nostrils—how high his head—the glare in his eyes—the tail held out like a plume—the ears working and the legs dancing! He has not been hit, but he has left his rider dead back there in the stubble—a Federal captain.

The horse stands pawing and snorting, when out from the whirl of death, half a mile away, breaks a chestnut charger and comes galloping down upon us. There is blood on the saddle-flaps—drops of blood on his shiny flanks. It is not his blood, but that of the Confederate Major who rode him, and who has been cut down by a stroke of the sabre.

It is gray vs. chestnut—Federal vs. Confederate. The new comer is still a hundred feet away, when the gray horse rushes at him with ears laid back and mouth open, and as I watch them I forget that shells are screaming, bullets whistling, and the sabre doing bloody work within sound of my voice. As the two horses come together they rear up, neigh defiance at each other, and a fight begins—a battle within a battle. Each seems imbued with a deadly hatred for the other, and to be determined to destroy his antagonist.

Now they rear up and strike viciously at each other.

Now they wheel as one, and kick and utter shrill screams.

Now they bear off to the left—now to the right—now crash together and strike and bite as if possessed of the spirit of furies.

Of a sudden I realize that they are close upon me. In their mad fury they see neither dead nor wounded—hear not the shot and shout of battle. The gray kicks a dead man aside as he backs up for a fresh effort; the chestnut tramples the life out of a wounded man as he dances about. They will be over me if I do not stop them! The heels of the gray are throwing dirt into my face as I nuzzling my carbine and rest it across my dead horse for a shot. I fire at the gray, as he is nearest and the greatest menace, but the bullet missed the target. At that moment they began to work to the left, and in the next they are past me, leaping over dead horses and trampling on dead men as they scream and bite and kick.

Above the roar of battle I hear a rifle shell coming. It gives out a growling, complaining sound which no man ever hears without a chill. The sound grows louder—nearer—crash! The horses were fifty feet away, and it must have struck one of them. There was a cloud of smoke—a whizzing of ragged fragments, and when I could see again both horses were down—torn and mangled and almost blotted off the face of the earth by the awful force of the explosion.—V. F. World.

Only the same old story, told in a different strain;
Sometimes a smile of gladness, and then a stab of pain;
Sometimes a flash of sunlight, again the drifting rain.

Sometimes it seems to borrow from the crimson rose its hue;
Sometimes black with thunder, then changed to a brilliant blue;
Sometimes as false as Satan, sometimes as Heaven true.

Only the same old story! But, oh! how the changes ring!
Prophet and priest and peasant, soldier and scholar and king;
Sometimes the warmest hand clasp leaves in the palm a sting.

Sometimes in the hush of even, sometimes in the midday strife,
Sometimes with dove-like calmness, sometimes with passions rife,
We dream it, write it, live it—this weird wild story of life.

Gossip.

Gossip is from God, and the Anglo-Saxon sib, related, and first meant a relation by religious obligation, a sponsor in baptism. In early days this embraced the god-mother, the father and the child. Then, from the feasting and good-fellowship which the christening caused, the word came to mean friend, neighbor, then a tattler, a news-monger, and at last the chat and scandal of the gad about.

"First, whispering Gossips were in parties seen;
Then louder Scandal walked the village green;
Next babbling Folly told the growing ill,
And busy Malice dropt it at the mill."

Feed the Heart.

"Is any miserliness so mean as that which holds loving words in the heart unspoken when dear lives are starving close beside us which our words would save and feed? Use your gift of speech to give comfort, joy, cheer and hope to all about you. Use it to encourage the disheartened, to warn those who are treading in the paths of danger, to inspire the indolent with holy motives, to kindle the fires of heavenly aspiration on cold heart-altars."

Here's a boy's essay on tobacco: "Tobacco grows something like cabbage, but I never saw none cooked. I have heard men say that cigars given 'em on 'lection day for nothin' was mostly cabbage leaves. Tobacco stores are kep' by wooden Injun's that stand at the door and fool boys by offerin' 'em a bunch of cigars what's glued into the Injun's hands, and is made of wood too. I tried to smoke a cigar once, and felt like epsom salts. Tobacco was invented by a man named Walter Raleigh, whose head was cut off. When the people first saw him smoke they thought he was a steamboat and was frightened. My sister Nancy is a girl. There is a fellow that comes to see her named Leroy. He was standing on the steps one night and had a cigar in his hand, and said: 'I don't know whether you like smoking or not.' And she said: 'Leroy, the perfume is agreeable.' But when my big brother, Tom, lighted his pipe, she said: 'Get out of the house, you horrid creature; the smell of your tobacco makes me sick!' Snuff is Injun meal made out of tobacco. I took a little snuff once, and then I sneezed."

Tommy—"Paw, what is a hold-over senator?" Mr. Figg—"The qualifications of a hold-over senator vary in different States. In Kentucky he is expected to hold over half a gallon without staggering."

The heraldic motto on the crest of the Prince of Wales is "Ich Dean," "I serve." It ought to be substituted by "I deal."

HOW BOB WON A BRIDE.

"Polly Lawson weren't what one might call handsome," remarked the old sailor as he sat in the old tavern one Christmas eve, with a number of veteran tars around him, all drinking hot spiced rum and spinning Christmas yarns; "but she had a dreadful taking way with her, and I presume that even at your age of life you has noticed as the takin'ist wimmin an't by no means the handsomest. But, as if to make up for the lack of beauty, some wimmin are awfully magnetic—so to speak—and have a way of sidin' up to men as fetches them every time. I know in the case of this here identical gal there was scarce a chap as boarded at old Mother Hughes', in Union street, Liverpool, but what considered it a honor, as well as a delight, for to be permitted to peel spuds of a night when it were Polly's watch in the kitchen.

"Polly were a pot-slewer for old Mother Hughes, her age bein' 'twixt 20 and 30. Rigged up of a Sunday she looked the fust; in the mornin', making the scouse, or blackball soup, for, maybe, three or four ships' crews, she looked 30 if a day; and at night, when the dishes had been washed and she snuggled herself up a bit and sat down to peelin' spuds, you'd take her for about five and twenty; so I puts her age at 'twixt 20 and 30, because I likes to be exact and do her no injustice. Of course, sir, with three or four ships' companies to provide for, it took nigh to a barrel of spuds for the mornin's scouse, and the slewers was glad enough for to have five or six of us chaps lend a hand at the peelin'.

"I was young them times, and though you might not judge it, looking at me now, I was as good a looking chap as you'd meet in a day's walk, and Polly, havin' the pick o' the house, naturally choosed me and a young fellow as was in the Shenandoah Philadelphia packet when I fust know'd him, I bein' in the Yorkshire, and me and him goin' out of one ship into another, managed to be always in Liverpool at about the same time, and a backin' and fillin' round Polly, eternally in each other's way.

"I presume, looking back at it now in the light of experience, as durin' the three months when we was't there, this other chap, which his name were Bob Lyons, goin' to Philadelphia and me to New York, Polly squinted at other chaps, makin' them believe, as she sartinly made me and Bob believe, as she liked 'em better than all the rest of the world, but them times, I bein' scarce out of my teens and Bob only jist past 20 years old, we both had an idea as there weren't nobody as could shine alongside of Polly as we could; and so cute was Polly that each of us believed as she thought more of him than she did of the other. She used for to say to me when 'twas my night off with her: 'That softy Bob Lyons; I wonder what ever he means a foolin' around me; why he an't fit to be named in the same day with you, Tom.' And I'm telling you, sir, I hysted it all in true as gospel. It are wonderful, sir, what an amount of humbuggin' a man will stand when he's in love, and, bein' with Polly off and on for a year or so, I got dreadful spoony onto her, and was lookin' fo'ward to the time when I might make with her a long splice and tie a knot with my tongue as I couldn't untie with my teeth. Bob was similarly disposed, and we got to be dreadfully in the way of each other, and two or three times came nigh havin' it out in the kitchen. Finally things came to a crisis, and goin' down aboard the night before Christmas, arter we'd both been very uncomfortable along of Polly, Bob says to me as we turned out of Union street into Waterloo road:

"Whatever are the use, Tom, of our gittin' athwart each other's hawsers night arter night? We can't both splice Polly, and I'm game for to do it if you'll sheer off."

"It takes two to make a bargain, Bob," says I, "and I don't think the young woman will look at you if she thinks I'm around."

"My idee ar," says Bob, "as either of us can sail in if the other will sheer off. At present we're only aggravatin' each other and troublin' Polly. Both of us is good men. Let's go down to the north shore to-morrow mornin' bright and early and have it out man fashion, the best man to have a shy at Polly for the rest of the time we're here, and if so be as she won't giv' in to him when we come next v'yage the other are to be free to spark her."

"Says I, 'Good enough,' 'cause I were that sartin that I could whip Bob out of his boots. Finally, this bein' Christmas eve, we concluded as how next mornin' would be the best for the mill, and I named as my second a chap by the name of Steve Whitman, as were a great chum of mine, Bob namin' a shipmate of his'n called Fred Nichols, and both of us stepped into the Windmill tavern, kept by a widdler of the name of O'Kaene, as were willin' to hang it up for Bob. We had a drink onto it, arter which we went down aboard, our ships bein' close to one another in the Waterloo dock, feelin' better than for many nights past, and glad as we'd arranged it all in such a friendly manner.

"Christmas morning at daybreak all four of us went down to Bootle Landmark. There is docks there now, but them times it were as nice a place for a little mill as one could wish, the beach as hard and springy as a dancing floor. Gettin' there, Steve Whitman said as how him and Fred had talked the matter over the night afore, and had come to the conclusion as neither of us would be in no fit condition for sparkin' Polly arter a hard mill, sich bein' the case, they—him and Fred—had argued as they would do the fightin' themselves. Steve for me and Fred for Bob, and this would answer the same purpose, so far as Polly was consarned, and that me and Bob should stand the drinks arter all was over, share and share alike.

"Me and Bob agreed as it was a very kind thing for them to do, but just what would have been expected of two good shipmates; and the men stripped and the fight begun. Arter about an hour of as nice fibbin' as I ever seen, I found it impossible to rouse Steve, he was that tuckered out, and I giv' in for him; and then I seen how I had gone to leeward by such an arrangement, for, whereas I were morally sartin I could have whipped Bob, Steve never couldn't whip Fred, and Polly was lost to me forever. However, I wasn't a man as would go back on a bargain, and from that time on I never went into that kitchen, and Bob had the gal all to hisself.

"As soon as we got Steve all right—he were a bit dazed fust—we all four went to a place kept by a man named Phillips as had been mate of a ship and had spliced the widdler as kept the place and so come to be the skipper of it. There we busted it out for an hour or so in a seaman-like manner. I don't think as Bob done much courtin' that night, and I know as I were in no condition for any sich nonsense; but I heerd tell, some time arter havin' shipped for London next voyage, as Bob and Polly were spliced, and that he'd took her to Philadelphia.

"It were another Christmas, a matter of 10 years arter that, afore I come athwart Bob Lyons agin, and I says to him, recallin' our mutual sparkin' of Polly Lawson:

"Bob, my boy, I'm right glad for to meet you ag'in, and I wants you to understand as I bears you no hard feelin's."

"You needn't of," says he, "but I wish to the Lord as your man had whipped," from which I inferred as his venture with Polly hadn't been a success, and, remarkin' as we never knew what's best for us in this life, I asked him for to go and take somethin', which he did."—Captain Coffin in New York World.

Four thousand women work in Washington for Uncle Sam. They get good salaries; they have easy hours, and they do good work. Still it is often questioned whether they are profited by the employment. It is said that a Government office is the death to matrimonial expectations on the part of the girl who takes it. The malicious whisper is sometimes heard that the departments are not good places for good women, and the question arises as to their influence for good or bad.

ORDINANCE NO. 29.

An Ordinance Regulating Saloons, Dance-houses, Theaters, and Places where Intoxicating Liquors are Disposed of by Retail, and Providing for Licenses Therefor.

The Board of Supervisors of the County of Sacramento do ordain as follows:

Section 1. It shall be unlawful for any person or persons to hereafter open, establish, or conduct, or cause to be opened, established, or conducted, any barroom, public saloon, theater, variety show, dance-house, or other place where wines, spirituous or malt liquors are sold by the glass, bottle, or otherwise, in less quantities than one quart, within the limits of the County of Sacramento, without first obtaining permission from the Board of Supervisors. The application for such permission shall be made by petition in writing to the Board of Supervisors, which petition must contain the names and signatures of a majority of the resident taxpayers in the election precinct, as it at the time exists, in which such saloon or place in which such liquors are to be dispensed is proposed to be opened or conducted.

Sec. 2. If, after due consideration of the same by the Board of Supervisors, the petition be favorably acted upon, it shall be the duty of the person in whose favor the petition was presented, and the prayer of which was granted, before opening the said place to file with the Board of Supervisors a good and sufficient bond, to be approved by the Chairman of the Board, with two sureties in the sum of $1,000, conditioned that the applicant shall maintain said place in a quiet, orderly and decent manner.

Sec. 3. A written verified complaint filed with said Board of Supervisors setting forth that any saloon or place mentioned in Section 1 of this Ordinance is conducted in other than a quiet, orderly, lawful and decent manner shall be foundation for action by the Board of Supervisors concerning the place complained of in said complaint. If after a full investigation, of which both sides shall have due notice and the privilege of being represented in person and by counsel and producing and examining witnesses, the Board of Supervisors find the allegations of the complaint to be true it shall make an order revoking the license issued to the person owning or conducting the place complained of and shall declare the bond given in such case forfeited.

Sec. 4. On and after July 1st, 1891, persons conducting the business mentioned in Section 1 of this Ordinance and in compliance with the provisions hereof, must pay a license tax to the License Collector of said county in the sum of $30 quarterly in advance; provided, that all licenses in full force at the time of the passage of this Ordinance shall entitle their holders to continue business thereunder until the expiration of the same.

Sec. 5. All parts of Ordinances in so far as they conflict with the provisions of this Ordinance are hereby repealed.

Sec. 6. This Ordinance shall take effect and be in force from and after July 1, 1891.

Names of the Months and Days.

January is from "Janus," the Roman deity that kept the gates of heaven. February, from "Februa," a name of Juno, from the Sabine word "februo," to purify. March, from "Mars," the Roman war god and patron deity. April, from the Latin "aperio," to open, alluding to the unfolding of the leaves. May is the old Latin "Magius," softened to "Maius," from the old root "mag," similar to the Sanskrit "mah," to grow, and means the growing month. June, from "juniores," or soldiers of the state, or from Juno the queen goddess. July, the name given to this month by Mark Antony (Julius) from Julius Caesar, who was born in it. August, so called in honor of Augustus Caesar (the month in which he took possession of his first consulship). September, the seventh month from March, where the year used to commence. October, the eighth month of the Alban calendar. November, the ninth Alban month. December, the tenth month of the old Alban calendar. Monday, the "Lunae dies" of the Romans, or "day of the moon." Tuesday, from "Tiwesdaeg," Tiw or Tiu being the old Saxon name for the Norse god of war. Wednesday is derived from the Northern mythology, and signifies Woden's or Odin's day. Thursday, so called from Donar or Thor, who as god of the air had much in common with the Roman Jupiter, to whom the same day was dedicated. Friday, the Saxon day of Fiegga or Freyja. Saturday, Saturn's day. Sunday, the Saxon "Sunnan daeg," or day of the sun; in the Roman calendar "dies solis."
